FRANCE AND MONARCHY.-It would be state of political parties than that which at present exists in France. As the embodiment of the sovereign power of the people here is an assembly, which will meet again in a few weeks, and in whose hands rests the efinite settlement of the government of the country. This assembly calls itself representative, and constituent, yet is somewhat afraid of a fresh appeal to the people. Its majority are inimical to the continuance of the republic, but are not quite united as yet about the Editors & Proprietors. order of the things which ought to succeed it; they are pretty fully convinced of the need of immediate action, because every vacancy in their ranks by death or resignation. seems to be used for the purpose of reinforcing the opposition. There are thirteen seats now in the Assembly, but the Ministry, which is the creature of the majority, has decided to order elections on Sunday next, for but four of them. Even after the most prudent selection, it is extremely unlikely that they will carry more than one of the vacant seats. The majority of the French Assembly have been trying very hard of late, to effect a 'fusion" of their plans and interests. The
