Poetry.

(Written for The Canadian Sentinel)
CHILDHOOD.
BY NENA BULMAN.

How often comes the thought of the green vernal hills—
The deep shaded valley, and silvery rill, The mossy roofed cottage—the flowers that bloomed,
And the meadow and wood where in childhood I roamed.

The pink petalled roses, the wild humming bee;
And the gay plumed bird in fancy I see:
The daisies I gathered—the hare-bells that blue
All, all come back to my memory now.

The glow worms that flitted at eve through the trees,
Or crept—how long ago that waded in the breeze;
The silvery moon, flooding earth with her light.
These are all in my memory as gems pure and bright.

The tones of the loved ones they ring in my ears,
As memory goes back through the vista of years.
Oh, are the bright days of my childhood all over?
Will I play on the grass covered hillside no more?

Select Tale.
THE BITER BIT.
A pleasant place in the cold winter days of early June in the Rue Doree at Rio de Janeiro—now re-christened, "Rua do I. do Margo," in memory of the last days of the Emperor, the late Emperor's daughter, the Princess, Brazilian. (In Brazil the height of summer falls in January, and the depth of winter in July. The most agreeable season is about the end of May.) Straight, wide, well-paved, containing the two principal hotels, and terminated by the palace at one end, and the custom-house at the other, the "Straight Street" certainly merits renown as the Oxford Street of Rio de Janeiro, though it must be owned that Regent Street is very inadequately represented by its offshoot, the Rua do Ovidor. On a fine afternoon (and very few are otherwise than fine in this glorious climate) the panorama of the great thoroughfare is not a whit inferior to that of its picturesque namesake, "the street which is called Straight," in Damascus. Teams of mules drawing queer-looking passenger-cars, whose open sides, guarded by rugs of wool, makes them look like the backs of a school of fish, bearing heavily laden costumed men staggering under fruits for which Covent Garden has no name; companies of soldiers in dark blue jackets and white trousers, black men and white men being mingled in the ranks like a half-played game of chess; street vendors of all sorts, with shirts and dry faces, doing nothing in any different ways as possible; brawny English sailors, looking at everything and everybody with an air of grand, indignant contempt; sun-burned pedestrians, clicking their little sticks together in place of a cane; street hawkers of all sorts, with trailing a platform society on the steps of the great church (straw-plaiting seems to be the Brazilian negro's forte. In every street I entered in Rio there were at least a score of blacks thus employed); and solemn Padres, melting under the oppression of the enormous hats and trailing a platform society on the steps
at least a score of blacks thus employed);
