BY ROBERT E. TIMONEY. A calmer feeling fills us now, A feeling born of autumn's days; See on the far-off-mountain's brow The autumn's soft and purplish haze.

The brook's soft voice, in murmurs heard, Seems but the shadow of a song; From forest trees each warbling bird Tells us his stay he'll not prolong. But with his mate he'll fly away

To countries far beyond the sea; Where, singing through each happy day, He will rejoice, from sorrow free. The frosts have come, while crisp and cold

Lie all the plants and flowers we love;

The chilling winds which sweep the world

Sound plaintive like a cooing dove. Autumn! take not all the charms Which Flora gave ere you were born; Bring not to us the dread alarms Of winter on each chilling morn.

'Tis vain to ask the boon I crave;

For winter comes with mien severe,

And trees in snowy whiteness wave. But Spring will come, and flowers spring From snow released and fertile soil, And forests once again will ring With notes of songsters praising God.

husband. It appears that two brothers Jasper and Clay Watkins, were rivals for the hand of the young lady, and that the former finally succeeded in winning the coveted prize. Clay was not satisfied with the result of his suit, and even after his brother's marriage he visited his house daily and sought to retrieve his bad fortune, notwithstanding the fact that the die had been cast. Jasper became enraged at the conduct of his brother. and seeing him approach the house, took down a double barreled shot gun and lodged its contents in his brother's breast. The wounded man was carried to his mother's house and skillfully cared for by the physicians, who expressed faint hopes of his final recovery. Learning that the prospect was not so dark for her bothersome suitor, Jasper's wife was prevailed upon to finish the work which her husband had so earnestly undertaken. Accordingly she visited her mother-in-law's residence, and after sitting a few moments by the bedside of the wounded man she drew forth a revolver, which she had carefully concealed in her clothing, and A House Built without Hands .- The walking up to within two feet of Clay, fired Change has almost invariably been found Overland Monthly tells of a famous house in on him, the shot penetrating the heart, kill-California, built without axe, or saw or ham- ing him almost instantly.
