Poetry.

ROME.
BY JOAQUIN MILLER.

Some levelled hills, a wall, a dome
That looms its gilded arch and lies,
While at its base the conqueror's hand
For bread and dust; and this is Rome.

Thou Rome that pouted, shrieked for Rome
To stretch thy limbs! A hill of caves
For wild beasts, as they were and slaves,
And gipsies tent within thy tomb.

A wolf-like stream, without a sound, Steads through and hides beneath the shore;
And awful secrets evermore
Within its sullen bosom bound.

Two lone palms on the Palatine,
A row of cypresses, black and tall,
And the great Colosseum, and the wall—
White roots that round white marbles twine.

They watch along a broken wall,
The first wall of the Colosseum,
And mourn for grandeur dead and gone;
And this is Rome—and this is all.

Yet Rome is Rome, and Rome she must
And will remain beside her gates,
And tribute take from kings and states
Until the stars be fallen to dust.

Yes, Time on yon Campanian Plain
Has pitched in siege his battle-flags,
And round about her battlements
Has marched and trumpeted in vain.

These skies are Rome! The very loam Lifts up and speaks in Roman pride;
And Time, outflung, and Time, and Time,
Sit by and wage his battle with Rome.

A Strange Story.

It is possible that some of our readers may be fond of ghost stories, and therefore I relate for their benefit the following legend about a certain London house.

For obvious reasons I suppress the names of persons and exact localities, and I further desire to be understood that I do not hold myself responsible for the accuracy of all the details of the story; I need only add that the events are to be taken as having occurred some years ago.

Some years ago, then, a gentleman whom we will call Colonel Somerville was desirous of buying a house in the west end of the town, and passing, one day, through a well-known square, he observed a house to be sold, which seemed to him, as far as outside appearances and situation were concerned, to be a very desirable one. The printed bill referred him to a firm of estate agents in the city, and to them he at once went, believing he could not help entering a miserable high and beyond his means. No harm, however, could be done by simple inquiry, and he accordingly called on the firm, and found that the sum demanded was only four thousand pounds. Not being a commercial man, he could not help expressing his astonishment at the small sum demanded, and naively inquired if the mansion was much out of repair.

The representative of the firm unhesitatingly replied that the house was in perfect repair, and would not require more than the usual outlay upon decoration. The Colonel pressed his inquiry, and, as he seemed to be a likely and desirable customer, he was soon informed of the circumstances under which the house in question had been sold. The house in question had belonged to a certain gentleman who had died intestate, and the sale was ordered by his next of kin, who had been found with some difficulty. This old gentleman had died, strangely enough, in the very act of drawing his will. He had just penned the will, and he had just signed it, and he had just died. The house
