The Western tannin plant (polygonuman-phibium), which grows luxuriantly in the Missouri River valley, seems destined to replace oak bark in tanning. It contains 18 per cent. of tannin, while the best bark contains but 12 per cent, and large establishments employing it in Chicago find that one-third more leather can be obtained with it than with a like quantity of bark. The process of tanning with it is identical with that with bark, but the leather is tougher, finer, and more durable, and receives a finer finish. The plant is an annual, and can be mowed, dried and stacked like hay.
