THE BRIDGE. Perhaps the most difficult operation to met with in the province of civil engineering broad and rapid rivers; and I may safely say that no task demands greater skill and judgment both in the character of the bridge to be adopted or in its after construction.

Possibly the first individual who conceived the idea of Woodstock becoming a Town saw in the dim future a bridge across the St. John at this point. And no doubt when he broached the subject to his neighbors they called him visionary. Yet for the interests of the country the bridge should have preceded railroads or steamboats, the former of which was not then thought of on this contiwho have been engaged in the scientific, mechanical and moral progression of the ninecondemned as visionary and fanatic.

the public mind. In that time a generation hardly seem to realize it.

The articles in advocacy of the bridge from

Co. was instituted by the late lamented Chas. Connell, who in 1866 obtained an act of incorporation with a grant of $30,000, conditional on a Company being formed and operations commenced by 1870. Just previous to the expiration of the act a plan was obtained from a celebrated engineer in New York, and an offer to build provided additional aid and an extension of time were obtained. Application was made to the Municipal Council and Legislature, but failed, and the prospect for the next generation was not much improvement on the past. The Intercolonial had gone by the North Shore, and the "Missing Link" advocating an extension of the Woodstock Branch on the western side of the river had been set forth by Mr. Whitehead. Any one at that time predicting a railroad on the eastern side of the St. John from Fredericton to Tobique, connecting by branches with Woodstock and Fort Fairfield, Me., with two bridges, one at Brick Building, up stairs. Tobique and another at Woodstock, would have been thought to have seen visions by night as well as by day.

The construction of the bridge, together with the one at Tobique, being the first truss bridges over the St. John, are highly creditable to Engineer Nichol. Long may they remain as monuments of his ability.
