HAS, for twenty years, been the favorite resort of the general travelling public in the United States, as well as in Canada, when visiting Montreal on business or pleasure. It is centrally located on McGill Street, the most thoroughfare and commercial centre of the city, commanding a magnificent view of the River Lawrence, the magnificent Victoria Bridge on the left, and a full view of Victoria Bridge and Mount Royal on the right.

The Hotel is furnished throughout in a superior manner, and everything arranged with a view to the comfort of guests.

It is one of the largest hotels in the Dominion, having ample accommodation for 500 guests, while kept in first-class style, the moderate sum of $1.50 will be charged as lavatory.

The travelling community will consult their own interests by remembering the Albion Hotel, when visiting Montreal.

BY THEO. READE.

"These are the drawing-rooms, Miss Clyde, and the music and reception rooms," Miss Challoner says, as she leads the way through the lovely apartments of Challoner House, down in Surrey, where I am newly arrived to take my place as companion and secretary-in-general to the Hon. ladies of the place.

"This is the picture-gallery," continues Miss Challoner, with a grand old fashioned air, that suits well with her silvery hair and stately mien, "and this," she continues, pointing to a particular picture, "is the portrait of my grandfather, General Sir Richard Hope. What the matter, child?" she cries, turning toward me; "you look pale and faint, is it too warm for you? Take a run on the lawn!"

"No, thanks, Miss Challoner," I answer, as calmly I can, "I am not warm —rather not; it is not too warm, indeed; I do not feel faint." So with a beating heart I stood gazing at the portrait of General Sir Richard Hope. How the mention of that dead man's name brought back to my mind the story of his life to me —his early runaway marriage with Everett Clyde, a poor artist, whose art claims were his handsome face and his love for her; the rage of her father, whose word she was, and his casting her off forever, and utterly refusing to see her when her obnoxious husband died and I was left a baby bride, in her weak white hands. It was at eighteen that I learned the name of my great-grandfather —it was General Sir Richard Hope.

And here I found myself, a small-sized motherless girl of nineteen, with a recommendation from Madame le Blanc's where I had graduated, in the house of my ancestors, and staring at the portrait of my great-grandfather.

"He was a very handsome man," Miss Challoner said with a sigh, "very handsome! That was painted when he was only thirty years of age."

Very handsome truly! A ruddy, high-bred face, with delicious blue, bewitching eyes, and a mouth that was red as a spinach, smiling in the curves under a little white mustache; he looked tall, too, and straight as an arrow in his regimentals, with his general's chap-eau in his hand, and his mighty swordhilt hanging at his side. Sir Richard looked a very valiant knight, in his youth to be sure; but with all his beauty, I had not much cause to love his memory.

You admire the General? Miss Challoner asked me, as I stared mutely before the picture. "Ah, everybody does; that is just the way I remember him when he was ordered to India and took us all with him. Janette married there, so did my brother Algernon; but they are dead, and there is no one left but Agnes and I,—the old lady goes on gargantuan, and I wonder under the splendid length of the gaily."

"Janette had no children, and Al-gernon only one—a son; and there was Lydia—poor Lydia!—I scarcely remember her; she ran away and married somebody else. I've forgotten the name even, and died shortly, and she left little one both."

"Little one?" How long ago my mother and womanly love none can know; but I held my peace, remembering my mother's almost dying instructions, "to seek none of my relatives, and to be my bread rather than owe to their bounty."

"Now, Miss Clyde, I believe I've shown you over all the lower part of the house. By my clock every evening I find two or three young men, who are sleeping the sleep of the just, and I sit on, crumpling the bright wood-fire, with some fascinating book, until eleven and twelve o'clock frequently."

I often wander all over the house, and spend hours in the library, pouring over my great-grandfather's books, and now and then coming across some volume with my mother's maiden name, Lydia Montresor, written on the fly-leaf in a faint, universal satisfaction, both as regards style, workmanship, sweetness of tone and lasting qualities, and are warranted for as many years as any other Organs in the market, and are sold for less money; and I will sell cheaper now than ever, to keep pace with the times.

POETRY.

Dear Auld Scotland.

I love thee, dear auld Scotland, thou hast fostered not a few Bold heroes, such as Wallace, Bruce, and Douglas, tried and true, And Randolph, Havelock, Moore, and Clyde and Wolfe, of warlike fame; Though they are dead their names still live, each one a household name.

I love thee, dear auld Scotland, what glorious names are thine, Knox, Burns, Tannahill, and Hogg, and Walter Scott sublime; Watt, Ramsay, Campbell, Livingstone, that name to Scotsmen dear, Who, when he died, was mourned by all, from the peasant to the peer.

I love thee, dear auld Scotland; on many a body field Thy sons have bravely nobly proved they know not how to yield;
They have fought in India, Russia, Spain,
And served as valiant men, And never yet were known to yield, though many a hard day they had seen.

Then hurray, hurray, for Scotland, her mountains and her dale, For her forests, lakes, and rivers, and her flower-bespangled vale; May the sun of bright prosperity shine sweet on the land of the brave, On the land of the bonnie Scotland, where the heather grows so green.
