Office hours A PERMANENT HOME.—To have a home which a man has himself reared or purchased—a home which he has improved or beautified-ahome, indeed, which, with honest pride and natural love, he calls his own---is an additional security for any man's virtue. Such a home he leaves with regret; to it he gladly returns. There he finds innocent and satisfying pleasure. There his wife and little ones are happy and safe, and there his best affections centre and grow. To such a pair, as time advances, the abode of their early and middle life, whence, perhaps, they have all departed, becomes constantly more dear; for it is now a scene of pleasan memories---the undisturbed declining years! And say, what lapse of time, what varied experience of prosperity or sorrow can ever efface the good impression made by such a home on the tender heart of childhood? To the tempted youth, to the wanderer from virtue, to the sad victim of misfortune, such remembrance has often proved a strengthening monitor or a healing balm. Nor can this kindly influence wholly fail so long as the dear objects of rom the leading American and Canadian Manu- that family scene retain a place in the memory, connected, as they inseparably
