Office hours | 100t into the left, and, "drunken with sleep," | 9 A. M. to 6 P. M. | -1yr-28 feels his way down stairs, falls over the hod of coals and kindlings at the kitchen door, and bursts into the dining room like a torrent. He jerks open the stove door, and having shook it down before he went to bed and put on a fresh scuttle of coal, taking the precaution to turn off all the dampers and shut it up tight, and the stove being one of those oldfashioned patterns and styles, which always command a sale amongst people before they have any experience, it is not wonderful that he inhales a few quarts of coal gas, spits it up mixed with some hard words, bangs the door and knocks over the poker and cast iron shovel with a clang like a rolling mill in full operation. He opens the dampers, seizes the shaker, and hooking it on the grate, shakes it savagely; and the grate, which has heretofore yielded sullenly to his strength, revolves as if it was set in oil, depositing the whole fire in the ash-pan, with the exception of two or three big clinkers that wedged it up edgewise .-First he tries to pull it back with the shaker, but the thing won't move. Then he gets down on his hands and knees and jabs at the clinkers with the poker, like a man stirring up a cage of animals in a menagerie, but the hot coals heat him up to another attempt on the shaker, and, springing to his feet, he braces himself for a mighty pull, when the grate slips into place like a spring lock, the shaker slides off and bangs his bare shins as he staggers back and knocks his head against the plaster partition.

Just then the night patrol man rings the front door bell, and asks, " if there is a fire in there?" and having the door slammed in his face with "No, I wish there was," tells his chum at the next corner that " --- is drunk and raising an awful row."

That unhappy citizen has hurried back into the dining room, and throwing a basketful of kindlings and wood into the stove, he lights them and starts for the coal bin. Returning with a hodful of coal, he essays to pitch it dexterously into the stove. Just then a puff of wood smoke strikes him in the eyes, the edge of the scuttle strikes just below the stove door, and the contents are dashed on the floor, with the exception of the finer particles, which sift into his slippers. With the calmness of despair, he fills the stove by shovels full, and with sneezes heralding a coming cold, waits until the fire is an accomplished fact. As he reaches the chamber door, a dismal wail freezes his already chilled blood, and he is welcomed back by his loving wife with ;-"I wish you could ever do anything about the house without making such a dreadful noise. Here is the baby broad awake, and I don't believe we shall get THRESHING MACHINES another wink of sleep to-night."

Then the poor man pulls the few hairs a virtuous life has left him, the comforts of his home fade from his mind, and he wishes he was a homeless wanderer in the cold streets, with the prospect of a warm lodging in the lock-up; but when he wakes up in the morning he regrets having harbored such thoughts.
