FAILURE TO CREDIT THE FARM.—My neighbor Tarris has sold the old farm on which he was born, and on which his people had begun life and succeeded to a competency. The land was rich and productive, the location healthy and attractive. Here, for half a century, the broad fields had ripened their colden have seen to be recolled a between the recolled golden harvests, the woodlands had fed the cheerful fireplace, the orchards had bowed their strong branches with ripening fruit, and the pastures had provided for the contented herds. Here ruddy-faced, light-footed, frolicsome children had a Lirthplace, and every widespreading old maple or oak by the wayside, under which they had played and swung, the brook from which they had fished, even the paths worn by little feet across the fields to the school-house, were connected with associations that could never be forgotten. Everything was here but contentment. My neighbor was a good farmer, and Items foreign & Focal. thrived well enough, but he had nursed the belief that "farming don't pay:" he couldn't see that he was making interest on what the farm would sell for, after throwing in all his
