THE Ballad Singer.
"Oh, mother, I'm so thirsty!"
And a feverish little face was held up to the poor, worn-looking woman, who brought a broken glass containing water to the side of the bed as the child called her.
I wish I could give you some more,
said the mother, and began again her restless
tossing from side to side, while every
sound on the stairs brought an eager,
expectant look on her pinched features,
as if she was waiting for some one.

THE Ballad Singer.
The mother sighed, and said to herself, "I wish I could give you some more,
said the mother, and began again her restless
tossing from side to side, while every
sound on the stairs brought an eager,
expectant look on her pinched features,

Day after day I passed the shop
Of the undertaker, large and jolly,
Whose figure was a study round her.
To profitable melancholy.
His step was firm and slow; his eyes
Had an expression rather dreary,
In sickly spring and summer time
His smile was generous and creamy.

THE Undertaker's Daughter.
Day after day I passed the shop
Of the undertaker, large and jolly,
Whose figure was a study round her.
