Poetry.
Battercups and Daisies.
A quiet lane—a sunny mead—A rippling brook—a tumbling reed—A mossy bank above;
And seated 'neath an oak-tree's shade
A bonny youth, a winsome maid—
The old, old story—Love!

He was entwining in a wreath The daisies from the mead beneath—A simple floral crown; Whilst she with battercups a score Told more than she'd e'er done before—Then laid the posy down.

Upon her pretty golden head He hung the daisy-wreath, and said—"Hail to thee! Nature's Queen!"
And seated 'neath an oak-tree's shade
In silk or cotton dress array'd—So beautiful, I ween.

Then pick'd she up a wild rose-That sported which in the hedge-row grows—And gave him, saying low, "Peace be a-moi!" Then down the lane They went, and those two in one twin,
In evening's after-glow.

Select Tale.
A Terrible Mistake.
Dora Guild was the daughter of an Indian general who died covered with fame, and left her alone and literally friendless in Bombay, where he breathed his last.
His dying words were: "Go home, my poor girl, to your aunt Arlingford, at Elmston, near London, and stay with her until you are married to Walter." For General Guild and Colonel Cary had been friends together, and comrades in many a battle, and had long ago affected their motherless children to one another, the wedding to take place as soon as the young man had attained his majority.

So here was the orphan girl, wearing the end of her journey, and gazing wonderfully at the strange and unfamiliar land of her birth.
There was one clause in her dead father's will which had recurred to Dora's mind with every present pain, ever since she had first heard it, and that was, she should, upon making the acquaintance of Walter Cary, refuse to marry him the bulk of her fortune should be passed over to her cousin, Penelope Ar-lingford.

That her dear father should think it necessary to cover her into complicity had rung from her many a time. "Why unversed in the strong minded ways of some English maidens, she had never dreamed of disobeying him, or of choosing a life for herself.
Miss Guild was seated in a quiet country house, surrounded by the most fervent assurances of welcome from her sole surviving relatives, who, of course, knew all about her affairs, and treated her with the most delicate courtesy.
Mr. Arlingford was a bluff, hearty gentleman, farmer; Mrs. Arlingford a reserved lady, who, however, seemed kindness itself; while Penelope, the only daughter, and Dora's possible rival for the fortune, was a gentle-faced, chestnut haired girl of twenty, who greeted Dora by vining her arm around her neck and laying her cheek to hers without a word.

In the course of the evening of Miss Guild's arrival, while she was giving her aunt some account of her voyage from India, she observed her cousin Penelope standing out on the lawn, talking earnestly with a gentleman.
It was a brilliant night in midsummer; the moon, white and searching as a great time-light, shone on the pair, and she saw Miss Arlingford's companion to be not only young and handsome, but also well dressed.

His hand held hers, and his stately head was bent over her in unmistakable adoration close to her tresses, while she leaned towards him in all the loving confidence of a returned affection.
Very soon they entered the parlor, and Walter Cary was directly presented to Miss Guild.
And the lover of Penelope!
Dismay, consternation, fell upon the heart of the orphan. There could be no mistake—every look, every action of the two betrayed it.
She was affianced to a man who loved another.

The cold touch of his hand on hers, the distant salutation, as if she were the merest stranger, proclaimed that he was resolved to ignore the contract which had been made.
Dora shrank into the darkest corner of the room, and bitter disappointment filled her soul.
Very soon, however, the conversation going on around the table arrested her attention. Walter Cary was telling Mr.
Arlingford and Penelope an account of a strange murder which had lately occurred.

"The man," said he, "was rather a clever chemist, and accomplished his purpose in a manner favoring more of the exploits of the 'Arabian Nights' epoch than those of our day. He got possession of his journal, containing her invitations, and she was an idol of her father, and a darling of her ayah.
She awoke, or, rather, she struggled back to consciousness—with these words running through her mind—"The result being a mysterious death, which no one could account for."

It was a disagreeable remark to occur to one in the middle of the night, and it roused her to a preternatural wakefulness.

She began to ponder over the events of the past evening, when suddenly something struck her on which sent the blood tingling to her heart.
It was like the trailing of a long mu-lin robe over the thick carpet which covered the floor, and a cautious rustling of paper: the one sound following the other with the slow and regular monotony of a machine.

The night was at its darkest, and the head of the bed was in an alcove, so that a view of the room could not be had: but Dora divined, with a choking of the breath, the meaning of the strange sound.
Penelope Arlingford was in the room!

Before she retired, Dora had read a chapter from a large bible which lay on her table.
She perfectly recollected placing it on the end of the sofa near the window when she had finished reading it.

She felt that her rival was on her knees before that book, impregnating its leaves with the "volatile poison" which Walter Cary had spoken of, and that as she finished each leaf, and turned it slowly over her long muslin sleeve she was doing the work, making the stealthy sounds which had aroused her interested victim.

Dora lay bound hand and foot by a feeling which almost stopped the beating of the heart.
Remember, she had grown up amid scenes of passion and violence: she had been among the helpless ones at Carn-pore, when the Sepoys massacred their victims in cold blood; and death was not so strange a weapon in the hands of a young girl, to her, as it would be to another, that seemed the one weapon by which Penelope Arlingford would most likely strike for love and wealth.

Motionless, her eyes distended, the cold dew of agony dripping from every limb, the orphan girl lay and listened to this evidence of treachery.
All at once a bounding way foot was heard, as though a heavy door had been passing over it, and the long wail of the garments followed it.

Then the door softly burst open as if without hand, a flow of air from the passage rushed across the girl's rigid face, and she saw the light of the battery, a little old man entered a saloon in that vicinity and asked the bar-keeper if he could leave some tracts there.
"A whole car load, if you want to,"
was the prompt reply, and the little old man placed a package on the bar table and softly slipped out of the window.

"There's no nobler cause than the cause of the heathen. We should all contribute a small share of our worldly wealth to shed the gospel light across the globe."
But Dora never revealed the whole of her terrible mistake.

FOR THE HEATHEN—HOW AN IRRE-VARIANT SALON KEEPER WAS TAKEN IN.
The day when the wind whistled and toned jigs around the battery, a little old man entered a saloon in that vic-
could leave some tracts there.
was the prompt reply, and the little old
man placed a package on the bar table
and softly slipped out of the window.

contribute a small share of our worldly
wealth to shed the gospel light across
the globe."
But Dora never revealed the whole of
her terrible mistake.

VARIANT SALON KEEPER WAS TAKEN IN.
The day when the wind whistled
and toned jigs around the battery, a little old man entered a saloon in that vic-
could leave some tracts there.
was the prompt reply, and the little old
man placed a package on the bar table
and softly slipped out of the window.

contribute a small share of our worldly
wealth to shed the gospel light across
the globe."
But Dora never revealed the whole of
her terrible mistake.
