Poetry.

It swiftly moves along And many travelling on. With cheerful heart and tongue,

When the last moment came; And filled with smoke and flame. Oh! what a change a moment brings To these within the car,

Of burning flesh and dying groans,

And sinking in despair. It makes me shudder while I think Upon the wretched state, Of those poor victims suffering there, And there unhappy fate.

What pen can write or tongue can tell The frightful, dreadful scene, To see them wreathed in fire and smoke, What angnish they were in.

And left their bodies burning there And numbered with the dead. By broken hearts bereft.

Each spirit there had fled,

Of pleasure and of gain.

One unwise act may change the scene With every one of us, Slay all our brightest prospects here And lay them in the dust

That calls to us to-day, To seek the Lord with all our hearts And come without delay. LONE WATCHMAN.
