Poetry.

Mary and Her Little Beau. Mary had a little beau As sweet as he could be; But every night he wouldn't go,

And that made misery. For Mary's ma, she never slept But listened full of fears; And when, so late, poor Mary crept To bed, she'd box her ears.

And pa said gas bills all were high And that the coal was low, And swore he'd murder by and by The chap who wouldn't go.

And Mary she grew thin and pale Her lover he grew stout; Her parents threats had no avail, He would not be put out. And spite of Mary's woful gaze He'd shovel on the coal,

And poke the fire to a blaze

And on the sofa loll. At length the pa and ma, both grave, When something must be done to save

Walked in the parlor with his cane-

Behind him came her ma.

Before it was too late.

And pa upheld the cane,

That now he must remain

Until he settled for the gas

And coal that he had scored

But if a marriage came to pass— He'd take it for the board.

Alas! poor Mary's little beau,

Had not wherewith to pay,

He'd settle up next day.

And then he took the lad

The cane, for he was mad.

Across his knee and swiftly plied

Then tossed him out upon the snow.

And double locked the door;

Which never came there more.

LETTER FROM SOUTH ROYALSTON

MASS. SOUTH ROYALSTON, MASS, ! March, 8th, 1880.

MR. EDITOR,—It is difficult to realize that we are yet in the first part of the third month of the year; the weather is more like hat of the middle of April than of the first of March. In fact, the mildness of the winter all along, is without a parallel, in the me-nory of that unquestionable authority, the oldest inhabitant. Many of the weather vise are forcasting a late spring and a cool ummer, &c., but it remains to be seen whether their predictions are correct. In he meantime, with the return of spring, come indications of increased actairy in all reaches of trade, and merchants and manu-
