consequence, with them also rested the re- sponsibility. It was felt outside that the Church of England as represented in that House stepped between large numbers of the people and their public rights, and also caus- ed a disturbance of their domestic happiness. Having briefly traced the history of the mar- riage law of England, he said that at the pre- sent day, while the right rev. bench asserted their authority in this matter, the enormous numbers who constituted the Noncomformist bodies of this country denied that it was a religious matter at all. The members of that House ought to bear in mind that they could not legislate for themselves. They must con- sider what was the general desire of the question, he repudiated the idea that the re- lationship of sister-in-law would be damaged by the passing of the Bill, and he called on the House to give it a second reading.
