The genuineness of my quotation I submit to any one who was sufficiently impressed to accurately remember. I regret that upor mere hearsay any attempt should be made to compromise my character before so large at element of the people of this County.

I trust that as a man I have too much pity for the sufferings of the Irish in their presen misfortune to make any uncharitable remark concerning them. I trust, moreover, that as a public officer, whose duties bring him it daily contact with those of that nationality. I have too much discretion to insult any whose good-will I should desire.

My remarks had nothing whatever to d with the hubits of the people. It was the e'onomy of the Sate; the meonsistency of Goversments that I was dealing with.

It further proof of this be wanting, the re marks, which immediately followed the obnoxious sentence, were sufficient. I proceed. ed to point to the strange inconsistency of the United States spending yearly 95 millionof dollars for schools and over 700 millions for its liquor bill.
