There could be a saving effected in the matter of contingencies and stationery. The Solicitor General had return to the land of his nativity and to his charged $54 87 for stationery for six months, ODDFELLOW. and it was a most extraordinary charge. He would expect the Government to justify this. It was generally conceded that the public printing cost too much, and it ought to be let out by contract. He had no fault to find with the expenses of the Toronto delegation. He remembered two members who had been sent to New york, and whose expenses had been made a theme for comment. The were sent as legislators, and had to travel as such. They could not do this as cheaply as they could if they were on their own private business. When gentlemen went abroad on public business they must keep up the dignity of the Province. (Mr. Johnson-Hear, hear.) per. The Vice-regal expenses seemed to be large. The Legislature invited royalty to visit the Province, should treat them as royalty should be treated. He was sorry a word had been said on the subject. Suppose this Legislature had been invited somewhere, and their entertainers afterward uarrelled with the cost. Suppose any of the members were invited to a house in Fredericton and heard the people on the streets next day discussing the expense. He regretted, and the Government should regret, the making of the travelling expenses of members a Provincial charge. He had returned the check that had been sent to him. It looked as though they considered the members too poor to pay their own expenses. He had no fault to find with those who had accepted the money, but they should remember the prayer, " Lead us not into temptation." He could feel for the Government, for their perplexity in the absence of party Government. He had had some experience himself, and he almost felt sometimes like taking part of the burden off their shoulders. (Hear, hear, and laughter). Members talked economy and told Mr. Tweedale. what they would do, when they were in opposition; but when they got into the Government they soon got into the same groove.
