In these summer months it can scarcely be expected that the young people will leave the out door attractions of pleasant evenings and balmy air; of cable walks and shady loiterings for 185 more stinted atmosphere of the Lodge Room. But these should remember that they live and move and preach by Each Opera presented with entire new Scenery, example on a broader platform than the floors of their Lodges. Society in which they Magnificent Costumes, live, their daily associates are of necessity influenced by the silent force of example, as well as by precept. The Lodge rooms should only be regarded as preliminary schools in which great lessons are inculcated and methods of work determined. These lessons imparted; that work arranged, are of little The child wonder, Master Harry Hamlin in his Miss Florence Story in Violin and Zylophone value if they do not affect the out-door life and conduct of members. We cannot think that they fail in these respects, and therefore Harrigan and Hart's latest New York Success, may expect that in the recess the practical work of the reform will be prosecuted and advanced. There is surely much work to do and continually. Everywhere are the constant evidences that, notwithstanding our great Store gain, the enemy is still alert, still vigorous,

The victims of intemperance are still to be seen; the votaries of the vice are still numerously crowding the pathway to a drunkard's grave, while the innocent yet powerless indirect victims-wives and families-are mourning and distressed beneath their unhappy fate. To rescue those and these; to save where salvation is possible, is a high and noble work. Let then all our Lodge members be alive to their duty out of as well as inside of their Lodge, and see that by pre- Are selling JEWELLERY cheaper cept and example the influence of our princi- than any other Retail Store in town.

The way in which a man lives has a great deal to do with his views for the future, for there are conditions of the body where there is a morbid sensibility of nerve, and illness renders a man sensitive to fear. It is qu'te in vain to talk to a man suffering from WARE that is made, and sell at cereberal morbidity of the folly of fear and the necessity of diminishing care. Men get out of order from excessive industry, from steady watch, from care, and so render morbid the whole nervous system, and for the time being will draw fear from the future. The remedy for such men is neither Bible nor prayer book, nor prayer, and there | Sell Wedding Rings as low as $1.50. is no need to call in the minister. They need the doctor more than the minister, unless the minister is a doctor as well, and all doctors should be ministers. All excesses should be avoided. It is just as dangerous too think to much about religion as to think too much of any other subject. Too much is too much of anything. Some men are hopeful; they go upon life exactly as a buoyant cork floats upon the waves. It goes up when they go up, it falls when they fall, but is evermore on the surface. I have known men bankrupted and they came up next morning smiling. Then there are other men whose hope is at a minimum. The future is never radiant to them. One great fault is throwing into the future inflamed desires. It is not wrong for men to desire riches. Certainly it is not wrong to desire that which is the principal motive to industry; but if this is carried to excess men become mean, detestable. There are multitudes of men that never think of enjoying themselves while they are acquiring riches. They put it off to the future and they live in perpetual anxiety and fret over the acquisition of property; property is a very good thing, but it never had a value that justified a man in sacrificing his happiness or his soul for it.

MAN'S NATURAL FOOD .- What is the natural food of man? As an abstract truth, the maxim of the physiologist Haller is absolutely true. Our proper nutriment should consist of vegetable and semi-animal substances which can be eaten with relish before their natural taste has been disguised by artifical preparation. For even the most approved modes of grinding, bolting, leaving, cooking, spicing, heating, and freezing our food are, strictly speaking, abuses of our digestive organs. It is a fallacy to suppose that hot spices aid the process of digestion; they irritate the stomach, and cause it to discharge the ingesta as rapidly possibly as it would hasten to rid itself of tartarized antimony or any other poison; but this very precipitation of the gastric functions prevents the formation of healthy chyle. There is an important difference between rabid and thorough digestion. In a similar way, a high temperature of our food facilitates delugition, but, by dispensing with insalviation and the proper use of our teeth, we make our food less digestible. By bolting our flour and extracting the nutritive principle of various liquids, we fall into the opposite error, we try to assist our digesive organs by performing mechanically a part of their proper and legitimate functions.

Apothecaries' Hall!

Call and see the New Apparatus

The health of the human system cannot be maintained on concentrated nutriment; even the air we inhale contains azotic gases which must be separated from the self-sustaining principle by the action of our respiratory organs, not by any inorganic process. We cannot breath pure oxygen. For analogous reasons, bran flour makes better bread than bolted flour; meat and saccharine fruits are healthier flour; meat and saccharine fruits are healthler than meat-extracts and pure glocuse. In short, artifical extracts and compounds are, on the whole, less wholesome than the palatable products of Nature. In the case of bran flour and certain fruits with a large percentage of wholly innutricious matter, chemistry fails to account for this fact, but biology suggests the mediate cause: the normal type of our physical constitution dates from a period when the digestive organs of our a period when the digestive organs of our (frugivorous) ancestors adapted themselves to such food—a period compared with whose duration the age of grist-mills and made dishes is but yesterday.

THE RELATION OF BRAIN STRUCTURE TO IN-THE RELATION OF BRAIN STRUCTURE TO INTELLIGENCE.—There is plainly to be noticed a growing doubt among the most competent biologists as to there being any fixed relation between brain structure and mental function. That pet theory of a few years back is not now tenable. There is a tertium quid in the cannot yet put our finger on. One example in point may be mentioned, from a recent lecture of Prof. Calderwood, of Glasgow.—
Speaking of insects, he quoted Sir John Ludbock with reference to their position in the order of development. Sir John soid that order of development. Sir John said that, though the anthropoid apes ranked next to man in bodily structure, ants claimed that place in the scale of intelligence. Once he had watched an ant working, and it worked from six in the morning to ten at night without intermission, carrying one hundred and eighty-seven larvæ to its nest. Professor Calderwood says that it became apparent that anatomical structure was not in itself an adequate guide in determining comparative importance in the scale of organic existence, and that even comparative brain structure could that even comparative brain structure could Societies and Wholesale Buyers at St. John St. John, June 23, 1881 not be taken as a sole test of the measure of Prices.
