LETTER FROM GEORGIA. The resurrected Atlanta, with its railroads and factories, the streets crowded with teams, and cotton piled up on all bands awaiting shipment, looks peaceful, bustling and thriv-ing. There are no heaps of unexploded shells and cannon balls lying in the streets and fronting the defences, as there were fourteen or fifteen years ago. You can still trace the outlines of the breastworks which were erected to defend the city, but the traces of Sherman's great bonfire, which lit the army on its march to the Sea, and proved the funeral pyre of the rebellion, have disappeared. The principal thoroughfares, chiefly lined with brick buildings, would do credit to a much larger city, walls the streets in the suburbs are ornamented with shade trees and dotted with handsome residences. Atlanta promises to be, as the people say, not well calculating to what they compare their aspiring burg, "the Chicago of the South."
