Over-fid Pigs.—When young pigs are sick it may be pretty certainly understood that they have been over-fed. The general treatment of pigs seems to be based upon the idea that they are naturally greedy and gluttonous animals, and that their habit should be encouraged as much as possible. Hence all the diseases which so frequently affect pigs. When a young pig is a tender animal, with a stomach that is not much larger than a human infant about as old, and yet people will cram the little creature with sour slop grease, milk, and cornmeal until it can swallow no more. And when the pig is sick one wonders what is the matter. We do not feed lambs or calves or colts in that fashion, hence these are rarely diseased. Cough and difficulty in breathing is caused by indigestion, and the common diseases of which partial paralysis of the hind parts is the chief symptom, and which is cerebro spinal meningitis, is caused by indigestion and malnutrition, which cause disturbance of the circulation and congestion on the brain and spinal marrow, with loss of nervous power.
