Poetry.
A Great Man.
Strong is that man, he only strong,
To whose well ordered will belong,
For service and delight,
All powers that, in the face of wrong,
Established right.

If such a man there be, where'er
Beneath the sun and moon he fare,
He cannot far from me,
Great Nature hath him in her care,
Her cause is his.

He looks his angel in the face
Without a blush, nor heeds disgrace,
Whom naught disgraced would move,
Disgrace. Who knows himself doth lie,
Fears nothing known.

He owes no homage to the sun;
There's nothing he need seek or shun;
All things are his by right.
He is his own posterity;
He leaves in himself doth lie,
His soul's best light.

Select Cate.
The Beach Farm.

And serve him right, said Mrs. Wyn-hart, grimly.
If Mrs. Wynhart had lived in ancient times, she would most assuredly have been ranked among the Scribes and Pharisees.

She was criticizing and finding fault,
Nobody suited her. And when she spoke out the short, decisive sentence above recorded, she set down the tea-kettle with an emphasis which jingled the very lid.

The neighbors had been there to drink
tea. Whenever anything of social importance happened in Sandville, the neighbors happened somewhere to drink
tea. And Mrs. Wynhart had drunk tea and frizzled beef, fresh doughnuts and damson jelly, to celebrate the occasion.

And now that the company was gone (Sandville people always put their knitting work in the bag and went home early on account of the beach road and the rising tide), Luella, the eldest daughter, was washing up the dishes,
and Winifred, the younger, was chopping
raisins for a pudding.

"Oh, mother," pleaded Winifred, who was a fair-haired, cherry-lipped girl, always hanging down her head like a wild anemone, "don't talk in that way, please!"
"Mother's right enough," said Luella.
"Why shouldn't I talk that way?"
said Mrs. Wynhart.

"It's the gospel," said Mrs. Wynhart.
"Jack Jelliff was a wild fellow, always hanging down his head like a wild anemone. What business has it of yours, I'd like to know, when he'd ought to be at home reading his 'Notes on the Chateaux'?"
"But mother," ventured Winifred, "you
let him come here to see Luella, when you supposed he was old Squire Sand-
man's son."

"I couldn't put him out of doors, could
I?" retorted Mrs. Wynhart severely.
"Besides, that's quite a different thing.
Squire Sandman ought to know his
nephew's shams, than any one else, and
he let him all his money to Simon, and
the country when he'd ought to be at
home reading his 'Notes on the Chateaux'?"
"But mother," ventured Winifred, "you

home reading his 'Notes on the Chateaux'?"
"But mother," ventured Winifred, "you
let him come here to see Luella, when
you supposed he was old Squire Sand-
man's son."

"I couldn't put him out of doors, could
I?" retorted Mrs. Wynhart severely.
"Besides, that's quite a different thing.
Squire Sandman ought to know his
nephew's shams, than any one else, and
he let him all his money to Simon, and
the country when he'd ought to be at

to the bleak loneliness of the Beach Farm,
with its acres of sea-grass and shingle said, and its old, one-story house, all beating to one side with the east wind?
Winifred looked at him with soft, glittering eyes.
"Jack," said she, "don't mind the loneliness nor the east winds if only you love me! I'd risk it all if—"
"Winifred! Do you really mean it?"
He asked, blushing beautifully.
"Yes, Jack," said she, "I'll risk it all, Winifred, for my sake?"
And she said it again:
"Yes, Jack."
Great was the tumult and displeasure
in the Wynhart family when it was discovered that Winifred had engaged herself to Jack Jelliff.

"It is the best thing Simon, now," croaked
Mrs. Wynhart, "I shouldn't have so much objected."
"But I didn't love Simon, mother,"
said Winifred.

"Love! repeated Luella, angrily—
"But I don't love Simon, now," croaked
Mrs. Wynhart, "I shouldn't have so
much objected."
