he a long one, and before putting the question he desired to thank the members for their gentlemanly conduct towards himself, as well as the desire manifested to help along business, during the time he had enjoyed the honor and pleasure of presiding at the board. It was satisfactory for councillors to realize that they each felt well towards the other, and it must be, he thought, satisfactory to the people the way in which they had conducted the public business. Although they were only bushmen, yet he thought that they never had to blush with shame when their deliberations appeared in print; he thought their sets and judgment would compare favorably with the Councils of other counties. There had been in two years a reduction in the assessment for contingencies from $2,250 to $750.00, and in a short time he believed the contingent expenses would be merely nominal. He again thanked them for their kindness and courtesy.
