What Katie Did. A True Story.

BY HELEN HARCOURT

'O mother! exclaimed Katie, rushing nto the room, an open letter in her hand, Jack is coming here to-night! He says one of the locomotives needs repairs, and he is to bring it over to the machine shop this afternoon. He's going to ride over on the engine with just a fireman, and he'll be home to supper. Katie rubbed her eyes and stared as if the hought she was dreaming, as she did think, in truth, for the reality was too sudden and too horrible to credit.

And then with a wild cry of 'Jack! Jack!' she darted down the steep bank and reached the spot where the proud locomotive lay prostrate amid the mud and slime and fallen timbers and stones.

Before she reached it she tripped over something, and recoiled from it with a something and recoiled from it with a something, and recoiled from it with a selfish Jack from the ruins of his entire of the fireman, who had been instantly skilled by the falling masonry of the arch.
