A TRIP TO GREAT-BRITAIN LETTER III.

THE AGRICULTURAL LABOURER. Much has been said about him on both escribed as the bardest on earth, If that ever was the case it is changed now. He is better off than many tenant farmers. He lives in a comfortable dwelling, has a garden and sufficient land to grow enough vegetables and fruit for his family. All of them can raise their own pork, some keep a cow also ; brew their beer, and many keep either a pony and gig or donkey and cart to convey them to market and church. He has no taxes or tithes to pay nor anxiety to bear. He no longer has to "eat the bread and smell the cheese," but is liberally supplied with all the necessaries of this life as he ought to be. While emigration was a good thing for those who left, it was also good for those who stayed, as wages rose in consequence. Laborers are becoming scarcer all the time.
