The elevated railroad bill or nothing to do. The elevated railroad bill passed the Senate without a dissenting voice. This was somewhat of a surprise to the public; but it having made amendments to suit themselves, sent it back to the House for endorsement, and then, if the House shall accept the Senate's amendments, it will be sent to the Gevernor for his signature after which it becomes a law. Probably by this time, one year hence, we shall have some kind of a railroad fast enough for the average American. The Boston public need something more rapid than berse cars and, doubtless, the elevated road will supply that vacancy.
