SYMPATHY. In sorrow once there came to me Two friends to proffer sympathy. One pressed warm, dewy lips on mine, And quoted from the word divine; Wiped the hot tear-drops from my eye, And gave my sore heart sigh for sigh; Told me of p in he had outgrown-Pain that was equal to my own. And left me with a tender touch That should have comforted me much. But still my sorrow was no less For all this loving graciousness.

The other only pressed my hand: Within his eyes the tears did stand. He said no word, but laid a rare Bunch of sweet flowers beside my chair; And closely held my hand the while He cheered my sad gloom with his smile Before he went he sang a song.
That I had known and loved for long. And then he clasped my hand again. With the same look that shares a pain. So, when he went, I laid my head Down, and was glad and comforted. Where was the difference, can you tell? I loved my friends alike and well:

I loved them both altke, but yet The one's warm kiss I could forget. The other's hand-clasp I could feel For hours through all my being steal. Each shared my sorrow, yet to me One brought but love, one sympathy.

GREATER THAN NIAGARA .- Writing to the Baltimore Sun from Sydney, N. S. W., a traveller says: "I have never seen anything in America that compares with Wentworth Falls in the combination of both beauty and grandeur. The water leaps a distance of 700 feet, as though falling over the back of the seat of a great arm chair cut out of the face of the mountain by some giant of nature. Falling in spray, it gathers itself for another run and leap, the second time falling 800 feet into a great gorge below. The fall is so far and the feliage so dense at the foot that the eye fails to see the second gathering place of the clouds of spray glittering in the sunlight 1,500 feet below. The valley below the falls spreads out into the great amplithe falls spreads out into the great amphi-theatre fifty miles across, and hemmed in on every side but one with perpendicular walls of the mountain. No human foot has ever been known to tread this valley, as it cannot be reached from below, by reason of a second precipice over which the same stream falls, and to go down from above would be a peril-us undertaking." Joseph Cook, a few weeks ago, speaking in Tremont Temple, said that if he made of his band, the sum would be $700,000,000; and if in his left hand he placed but the liquor bill of the United States, the sum would be $800,000,000, and that scale would go down, other.
