A FRIEND at Benton sends the following graphic account of the effect of the freshet at that place on Tuesday :-

For the past week the water in Eel River had been rapidly rising. On Friday the mill shut down on account of back water. Health and Happiness. The railroad track from Fish Creek down to the station was under water, in some places over a foot. On Sunday, the highest flood mark was passed, and we thought of the Western floods. Still the water kept rising; our sober old river had lost its old time character and become a toaming, rearing floed. Last night we got word that the dam at the foot of Fish Lake had gone out, and some families who lived near the water remained up all night. The rus of water reached here about six o'clock this morning. The booms and dam were already strained to the utmost, and when edded to the extra rush of water a few logs get loose and came down against the gates, the whole dam, from the eaw mill to the tannery gate, went out with a crash, and the logs, drift stuff and top works of the dam came down in the white surges, like a wild cavalry charge, on the were on the bridg hen the dam gave way "put" for the shore. They saw the charge, heard the groans of the bridge timbers, beheld the fierce host crash under the bridge, and admired the determined resistance. When the logs piled up and the tremendous weight of water behind boiling with fury crowded on, the old staunch structure trembled a moment, was partly lifted from its foundations and was just being hurled into the stream below, when some huge logs reaching from the stone pier to the centre abatment formed a jum and in a twinkling logs piled on each other as only a jam of logs can and the bridge remains-out of position, it is true, and the floor at an angle of 300, but it is there, and all agree that it made a most While this pitched battle at the bridge was going on, the charging flood made a flank movement to the right, leaping over the long flume or pentstock belonging to the tannery sweeping it out of its path like a rope o straw, surrounded Mr. Appleby's bouse and in a trice covered the lower floor thereof; then carried off the wood pile, frightened the inmates and swooping across the Main street rushed at the leach house, pouring in at the open doors. From here it made a mest de termined attack on the main building, and bursting in one pair of doors the unwelcome flood plunged into the vacant vats and for the moment threatened to take full possession. But the main flood had passed down stream place, the attack on the Tantery was fruit-A mile below is James Murehie & Sons mill. Here the valley of the stream is wide, the stream and mill near the farther shore. and the space between the mill and the high land on this side is an edging bed, on which a branch track goes from the main railroad line to the mill, thence back to the main line, at a point say 100 rods farther down the stream. When the flood reached this point there were seven platform cars on this upper siding. The oncoming rush of water hurled iteelf and the mass of logs and other lumber over the barrier of the branch track, overturning the cars, plowing its way through the edging bed and down over the main railroad track, driving before it about two thousand railroad sleepers, a large quantity of cordwood and one lot of twenty cords of bark, heaping them up along the track and This new channel the flood made for itself comprising:

This sad dispensation has cast a gloom over our village, and seems more grievous from the fact that all have been mothers, taken from those homes and centres of families where they were most required. Mr. Burpee and family have been residents of our place not much over a year, but during that time have won the respect of all; and much sympathy is manifestlarge circle of relatives and friends.
