Potato digging is now nearly completed. The yield is fair, but the tubers are rotting badly. A number of our villagers have been engaged to build; and general improvement and prosperity are noticeable everywhere. There are several new edifices worthy of mention, but orincipal among all the buildings erected is the ine residence of Frank Rankine, Esq. It is built on the site of his residence burned about a year ago. The building is a plain but handsome structure, two stories high, and surrounded on the West and South sides by a neat and substantial veranda. The house is well planned, and there is a chance, owing to the levated site, to make most beautiful grounds. The inside is well laid out. The main entrance
