Love and Air-Brakes.

BY FRANK R. STOCKTON.

it was in the afternoon of a pleasant August day, and in company with a lady was returning from a long country ramble. Our walk, indeed, had been so protracted, and we had stopped so often to enjoy points of view and bits of color that Miss Briston was very much afraid that we would not reach Hampton, the village in which we lived, before tea time. By the regular road to the village we still had a mile and a half to walk but there was a shorter way, if we chose to take it. Not far ahead of us a railroad crossed the road in which we were walking, and entered a long and deep 'cut. By following through this excavation we should save at least a mile. I made this proposition to Miss Briston, and sheagreed to it, provided that I was sure no train would come through the cut while we were in it. I looked at my watch. The five o'clock up train. I said, has passed half an hour ago, and there is no other until seven. It will be perfectly safe for us to go through. Then we will go that way, said my companion, instead of walking around that tiresome curve of a road.

The cut was about a quarter of a mile long, and the contractor who had excavatmaking it any wider than was necessary for the single track which ran through it. to a sudden stop and looked at each other. Miss Briston turned pale.

Let us run! she cried. I caught her by the arm. Wait ! I said. Which way is it coming? I don't know, she cried; but oh, us get out of this place ! But I still held her. I must consider moment. It would be dreadful if we were to run the wrong way, and, for my life, I could not tell from which direction the whistle came. I glanced about me. and formed of loose earth. It would be impossible for Miss Briston to escape that way. And, more than that, I felt out of the cut, even if we went in the long way to run with a special express train, such as I was certain this must be, close upon one. A man might lie back But that would not do for this dear girl. The 'wind' of the rushing train might cause her fluttering garments to be caught by some projection of the cars. And, besides, she would be frightened to death. It did not take much time to think of all this, but that left less time in which to decide what to do.

But decision came quickly. The train must be stopped. The engineer may see us in time to prevent a catastrophe, stop the train myself. Luckily I had in
