LIFE'S UNDERCURRENT. Oh! Fame in thy temple, grand and high, There are panels with glided frames, And lustrous records, too grand to die, There are never forgotten names. There are shinining archives of men who stood For the right in the days of old. Is there no niche for the true and good

Whose annals have never been told. Hearts may not scruple to laud the brave, Who have fought for their native land, Who sought to be free and found a grave, They must still be a laurelled band. But under the sweep of life's wild sea, Are tales the years never unfold, Sacrificed hearts of lowly degree, And deeds that no minstrel has told.

Is there no scribe, with the pen of steel, Twrite of the patient and poor? Have we no words to tell what they feel? To paint how they wait and endure?
Tis easy to die where banners wave, When we know that kings call us bold, But what of the nameless dying slave. Whose sufferings seldom are told. Never fear, hearts there is fame for you,

There's a writer who faileth not, An angel records what heroes do Though cheerless and low be their lot At the end of the years and the days, When Time like a scroll shall be rolled, When the Master shall ask of men's ways, Then, there will your annals be told.

A man once said to me, "Do you believe there is more strength in a glass of water than in a mug of ale?" "Stop a bit," I answered, "that's not a fair comparison. You pay five cents for your mug of ale-I get my glass of water for nothing. Besides, when I drink my glass of water, I am satisfied with it; but if you drink a glass of ale, directly you must send down another to keep it company. Suppose, now, you get a quart and pay twelve cents for it, and I take the same amount of money and pay six cents for steak, and two cents for bread, and two cents for potatoes, and two cents for apples, and have a glass of fresh water for nothing. Which is the best? I eat my dinner and am satisfied with it, and go back to my work and earn more money. You go back to the saloon to get more ale, to spend your money,
