OUR SOUTHERN BUDGET.

SOUTHERN PINES, N. C., June 7 .- The traveller through the South is astonished when he looks at a field of growing pines and is assured that they cover ground that a few years ago were cultivated fields. They have a strange way down here of "turning out" land that has been worked out. The growth of the pine tree is certain to come. First the land, after it is "turned out," grows up in broom sage. The winds sow the seeds of the pine trees, and in a few years the broom sage has to give place to a thick growth of young pines. A large field of them looks " mighty pretty, I reckon," but they are about as profitable as a dog at a shooting match. Some of the finest farms we have seen in the South have been built on these old and thrown away lands. Dear, dear, dear! how things do change heir names as one moves about from one part of the country to another. " Pails," become "kettles," or "buckets," just according to the place in which you are located.
