He is charged a certain amount for the rent attendance, meals and sometimes lights. The balls and dining rooms and parlors often contain cabinets with collections of old china or natural history collections, and other interesting articles which one in America would not think of looking for except in a private house. I remember seeing in one hotel at Melrose, among the other curiosities with which the walls were covered, a pair of New Brunswick snow-shoes crossed above the door in regular Canadian fashion. The furniture also is not apt to have the stiff hotel like appearance that one expects to see, but is plainer and more comfortable and at the same time more varied in style, much as would be the case in an old fashioned home. The houses in Keswick and all the neighboring towns, are built in a peculiar fashion, the stately stones with which they are made being placed on one another without any mortar between them. This is as far as the outside appearance goes, but I doubt not there is plenty of mortar out of sight on the inside of the walls. After tea we walked out in the cool of the evening, noticing many an unfamiliar sight and sound as we passed along. On one street we observed three young fellows, "toughs" we would call them, walking along arm inarm very leisurely and singing "There is a fountain filled with blood," to an old familiar tune, the bymn being sung in painfully slow time and with a pause of ten seconds or so between each line; the whole thing had a most peculiar effect and we did not know whether to be mystified or amused by it. from Loch Katrine. It is proposed to build a tunnel seven feet wide and with an arched roof seven feet in height between this point and Manchester. A little farther on we came upon some more excavations and entered into the tunnel for some distance where a gang of men were busy cutting into the solid rock. After leaving Thirlemere the oad passes over what is called the Dunmail Raise from whence there is a continuous descent for several miles into the town of Frasmere. The road for this distance leads brough a bleak region with high grass covered bill ridges on either side. This is said to have been a favorite walk of the soe Wordsworth, but I must confees that I see little to admire in it. The only thing I remember noticing about it was the great number of signs posted up on little eight inch streams: " A reward of one guinea will be given to any person who will give such information as will lead to the conviction of Keswick is a little place of about 5,000 anyone found fishing in this stream." We felt tired enough when we reached Grasmere and were quite willing to settle down for the night. We walked round the village taking a hasty glance at the various hotels and decided upon putting up at the "Red Lion," remember often seeing in Sunday School papers as the vile inn where the husband used | Samples sent Post Paid on application. to go on Saturday night and spend all his week's earnings. Adjoining it is a stone bearing the more detailed description of their lives, together with the lives of other members of their family. Over the grave some fine vew trees spread their shade, and near it the Rothay winds along. Just back of Wordsworth's grave lie the mortal remains of Hartley Coleridge, a son of the great poet Coleridge and himself a poet of no mean order. At the head of his grave is a small stone surmounted by a Greek cross with a circle around it bearing the words . " By Thy cross and passion, Good Lord, deliver us." The church door was open as we were passing of m st peculiar construction, differing altogether from anything we had seen before. Darling l'aul thou hast left us, And thy loss we deeply feel, But 'tis God who has bereft us, He can all our sorrows heal. Yet again we hope to meet thee, When the day of life is fled. And in heaven with joy to greet thee, Where no farewell tears are shed.
