plant in the window grew and grew, But it yielded naught that was fair to view; Its form was ugly, its leaves held stings That pierced and tortured like evil things, And daily and yearly it seemed akin To a life of selfishness, hate and sin,

And on blazing sunshine it joyed to feed, As if gathering fire for deadliest deed. But at last, one day, a rich perfume Rose incense-like, till it filled the room, And lo! on the plant, a flower most fair,

Like the spirit of purity resting there. And I saw in the flower so wondrously planned, Two beautiful lessons, simple yet grand.

The ugliest shape may be found to hold A soul of the purest loveliest mold— And blossom-time comes, be it soon or late, For him who has patience to work and wait. -Emma C. Dowd.

LUBBER DICK.

Selegt Tale.

BY J. M. MERRILL 'He's a lubber, and no mistake.' And that is what we all thought. Sleepy-eyed, slow of movement, barefoot, ragged and not overly clean, he presented himself at the door of Woodland's mill shanty and asked for a job. Dan Chambers, the giant of our crew. stepped aside with the ragged tramp and held a whispered consultation, every now and then winking with his off eye at the boys standing about. After a little the fellow walked away, passing throughout the gate with a listless air, and clumping down the road amidst a chorus of laughter and sarcastic Low Rates, remarks from the assembled millmen. 'Wall, by thunder! see, boys, the feller is goin' inter Major Woodland's For Sale on Commission. | yard,' cried Sam Horton, the sandy teamster, with a broad grin.

Major hired the first one that came along. Trust it to me, boys, he won't stay long. I'll send him off with a flea in his ear before he's been here a week.' I was a boy then, choring about the cook's shanty. I saw Lubber Dick only evenings and at meal time. He was not prepossessing nor smart; this I thought was reason enough for giving him respectful treatment. A gang of men are sometimes the most unreasonable beings on earth, and Woodland's crew were of this sort. Scarcely a word fell from the lips of was a morose, unpleasant fellow, and the jokes aimed at him fell on barren ground. Ridicule had no effect on his obtuse nature. Dan Chambers began to feel

'I'll fix him yet,' he muttered in my hearing one morning. 'To-night we're to have a wrestle. The Dight boys are coming over, and you may look for a big time. I think Lubber Dick won't want any truck with millmen after to-night.' This put the man addressed, Horton,

The sun was an hour high when a and the wrestling began. Dan Chambers was our champion, but to-night he went down before the prowess of Hi Dight of 'Will you permit me to take hold?' All were astonished when Lubber

Dick put this question to Chamters. 'Yes; take hold,' growled Dan, and urned moodily away. The crowd was breaking up. Our side had lost, and the trick Chambers had meditated against Lubber Dick was forgotten in chagrin

'Ha! look there! It was a sight to see. Hiram Dight lay on his back under the knee of the Dan Chambers rubbed his eyes. 'You can't do it again,' growled Dight, enraged at losing the championship. 'I can try,' was Lubber Dick's dry re-

Father and son were delighted to meet, and from that moment the oldtime jollity returned to Chambers. Once, a few days later, I saw the boy, Arthur, in converse with Lubber Dick.
