And wonders in words that know nothing of

Joyous at heart as a summer day A lassic stands by the meadow way,

And looks at a face that is very dear,

Loving me well as I have loved you!

And time and change, and good and ill, Have linked us closer and closer still—

Hearts ever true, love! hearts ever true?"

Kum, the Curse of Ireland. We are not likely to forget the wrongs of Ireland. We hear them at all times and from all quarters. We hear of her landlordism, of her priest-craft, of her famines and her poverty; but it is possible that the grand curse of Green Erin is largely overlooked. Let us look at a few facts :-

"During the last famine year, 1879, Ire-land stretched forth her hands to receive the contributions of the benevolent all over the world. Appeals for bread for her starving poor were incessant, and their utter destitution was portrayed in language that brought tears from the eyes, and generous donations from the purces of sympathetic multitudes. A Horrible Superstition Some strange sights were witnessed the other day at Carpentras, during the execution of a man named Ginous, who had violated and murdered a little girl of eight, some moths ago. Ginous thought he would be reprieved at the last moment. When his Any case of lame back cured by a few appli- death warrant was read to him he appeared which was to take him to the guillotine, he o smoked a cigarette and drank a glass of rum. An immense crowd had assembled to see him die, and as soon as the knife severed his head from his body the people burst through the ring of troops and rushed to the gaillotine, where children were sprinkled with the murderer's blood. This horrible proceeding is believed in the South to be efficacious in preventing children from becoming murderers
