It is perience in party politics which may prove past, very much reliance may not be put in the plan of appointing men to the vacancies pledged to vote for abolition, and that the most effectual way to reach the conclusion desired is to allow the vacancies to remain and let the Council die a natural death. We presume the Government is disposed to fulfil its pledges when and as it can, and we appreciate the difficulties surrounding the matter. At the same time it does appear a remarkable state of things, under our system of responsible government, when this portion of our legislative machinery must be continued in face of the almost unanimous opinion of press and public that it is unnecessary and
