MR. GRAY'S WOOING.

Mr. Gray was a man who had committed a great blunder. He had retired, and now time heavy on his hands, and he knew not what to do with himself. So, for lack of better occupation, he took to calling on a certain plump widow of his acquaintance, who had a remarkably pretty daughter.

Bessie Peeples was a younger edition of her mother. They had the same black eyes, rosy cheeks, and wavy hair, and truth compels us to add, the same quick temper.

"I'll never marry old Gray," Bessie told Mrs. Peeples, defiantly, after the manner of the young lady, who "refused a man before he asked her." For Mr. Gray had not yet proposed, although every evening he presented himself at the widow's dwelling and sat by the fireside in the most comfortable chair in the room.

"We shall see," muttered Bessie, and put on her hat and slipped out to have a walk with her admirer, Jack Wilkins, to whom she confided her trouble.

Jack was poor, and for that reason had refrained from offering his hand to pretty Bessie, but when she told him that old Gray was after her, he could no longer disguise his feelings, and before she had parted the girl he loved had consented to be his wife.

"What will mother say?" thought Bessie with a sigh, as they parted at the gate of Mrs. Peeples' cottage. "That horrid man will be the end of my life!"

That horrid man was there, in an armchair opposite Mrs. Peeples. He smiled at Bessie when she entered; but Bessie frowned at him in return, and his face fell. That evening the girl was absolutely sullen; she spoke in monosyllables, and ill-temper deprived her pretty face of half its beauty.

"I am afraid her mind is set against it," Mr. Gray told himself, with a sigh, and we might all be so happy, if she could only look at the matter in a proper light; but I suppose it's natural."

And he doubled his efforts to be agreeable - poor little man, for he had an affectionate heart, and his big house was dull and lonely.

But Bessie's face never relaxed its set expression. She hated the man, and meant to let him see it, in defiance of her mother's angry glances. What business had a man old enough to be her father to come courting her?

"You have behaved disgracefully," said her mother, when Mr. Gray had taken his departure. "It is wicked to trifles with the love of any man."

"I have never trifled with his love," retorted her daughter; "he must know that I hate him. I have never attempted to disguise it; now have I, mother?"

"You are a fool!" said her mother, bluntly. "Mr. Gray is the best chance you ever had, or ever will have, and I insist on your saying yes when he asks you to be his wife."

"Mother!" cried Bessie, impulsively, throwing her arms around her mother's neck, and hiding her face in her bosom, "mother I have already said yes to somebody else - somebody I love dearly."

"What?" gasped Mrs. Peeples, freeing herself from her daughter's embrace.

"It is true enough," said Bessie, in a fluttering voice. "Jack has asked me to marry him, and I have said yes."

"Without consulting me!" exclaimed her mother, angrily, looking at her with a stern, reproachful face.

"I love him," returned Bessie, "he is the only man in the world that I could ever care for."

"Stuff and nonsense," cried Mrs. Peeples. "Even if I liked the young man - which I don't - your marrying would be out of the question. He can't afford to keep you."

"I am not afraid of poverty," said Bessie bravely; "besides, we are not going to marry in haste. We can wait."

"Poor fool!" and Mrs. Peeples's lip curled. "I know what this waiting means for women. She goes on trusting and believing in his promises, and then when her beauty has faded, he turns round and marries some one else."

"Even then," said Bessie, "the woman is better off than if she had tied herself to some one she could not love."

"Yes, you are made - quite mad," returned Mrs. Peeples; "but thank goodness you have a mother who won't allow you to make an idiot of yourself. You will marry Mr. Gray, and forget all about that misguided young man who ought to be ashamed of himself."

"What for?" asked Bessie, with resentment.

"For proposing to a girl to whom he has no means of keeping in comfort," returned Mrs. Peeples. "You are a pair of lunatics, but fortunately I've some sense left, and I won't let you see my daughter ruined for life."

And she flounced off to bed without giving Bessie the usual good-night kiss. Poor girl, she missed it sorely, and sobbed herself to sleep; but she meant to be true to Jack, all the same. Not even her mother's anger would induce her to give up and consent to marry old Gray.

She treated the object of her dislike with the greatest coldness on his next visit, and succeeded in making him look thoroughly miserable. But he brightened considerably when Mrs. Peeples, to atone for her daughter's rudeness, sought to engage him in conversation. Indeed the grateful little man ventured to give the elder lady's hand a gentle squeeze when he rose to take his departure, and to his surprise and joy it was warmly returned.

"Now if Miss Peeples would only give over her objection how happy and comfortable we should all be," he thought, as he hugged home. "Hullo!" coming face to face with a handsome young fellow in a shabby suit. "How are you, Jack Wilkins?"

"O, I am all right, thank you," said Jack, sulkily, and strode on without another word, while little Mr. Gray stood gazing after him with a look of incomprehension on his face.

I suppose she has been telling him all about it, he said to himself with a sigh. Its natural, I suppose, but its selfish, too. Yes, it is a little bit selfish of them."

And shaking his head, the old gentleman "knocked at the door of his house - that large, gloomy house that had never seemed homelike since the death of that sister who had been his right hand.

When we think we are going to make people happy it is hard to find that we are regarded as an enemy, and Mr. Gray retired to rest in rather dismal spirits. He arose the next morning with the determination of putting an end to his suspicious of offering himself and his home to the object of his attachment; he could bear the suspense no longer.

When he arrived at the widow's cottage that evening Bessie was not at home. She had gone out to tea with some friends. Mrs. Peeples said.

"I'm glad she's not at home, dear Mrs. Peeples," said Mr. Gray, looking very red and nervous. "I'm glad she is not at home, because it gives me an opportunity of saying something that is near to my heart."

He edged a little nearer to the widow as she spoke, and she smiled at him in an encouraging way. She was a handsome woman, and her smile revealed the whitest teeth in the world.
