Noetry.

(For the Carleton Sentinel.) Slander. See yender toil-worn widow there, Her form is weak and worn with care; Once hope did brighten up her way, But fate at length obscured her day. Once in the arms of love caressed-In every thought and wish was blessed; Nature formed her pure and kind, With soul most generous and refined See how she strives from day to day To keep the hungry wolf away, Till, worn with toil and sick at heart,

Perhaps some man who watched the strife Now aids her in the fight for life, By kindly glance or cheering word The fainting heart again's been stir'd; Or perchance, more generous still, With money aids her if he will. Now see your prudish vixen there, How fiendish-like is now her stare; Slander working in her heart Until, of it, it forms a part. A lover's heart she ne'er did charm, Around her waist ne'er was an arm, The saleguard of whose virtue's been A shrewish look and hateful mien. She twice to church on Sunday goes And thanks the Lord she's not as those-Her evil eve still glancing round

To see where gossip may be found,

Her one main wish, when spoken loud.

The admiration of the crowd; One spot of pure or fruitful ground But envy's home you there can see oisonous as the Upas tree. she whispers to her tattling friend ome slander that will never end, At arms length holds them up to scorn And smiles to see her victims torn. man I know in certain place Famed for virtue and for grace, Whose prayers are heard at night and morn, Whose graces do the meals adorn, Most circumspect in every way, And fears the Lord from day to day.

He watches how true churchmen go, To evil seems to be a foe. But still within that good man's breast fear that envious thoughts do rest, And grace—that boon to mortals given To win from earth and fit for Heaven-Has not yet stamped from out the heart The meaner things that form a part. He wants the world to think him grand-Though meaner's not found in the land-And, should you meet him every day, His hand will clasp yours on the way; A noble fellow you will be If always with him you agree: His opinion ask from day to day,

His favor court in every way; Unto him, like a burr, still cling; Ungenerous thoughts at others fling. Though good he to the world appears, More slander in an hour he hears l'han you could bear upon the way Though travelling till your dying day But should you never court his smile, With other friends the hours beguile, He soon will pass you with a sneer And damning words you soon shall hear Each jesting word, each trifling thought, To bear against you will be brought; This man, in church brimfull of grace

Has slander shining in his face, And, envious of another's fame. Would ever blast an honored name. Oh, no! he would not tell a lie, For others sins he'll groan and sigh, And of religion seems possessed While slander rankles in his breast. And thus it is from day to day We meet with such upon the way-A long and sanctimonious face Is ever sure such one to grace. -Rusticus, Debec

I had position high and holy. The demon tore from around me the robes of my sacred office and sent me forth churchless and Godless, a very hissing and byword among men. Afterward my voice was heard in the courts. But the dust gathered on my open booke, and no footfall crossed the threshold of the drunkard's office.
