Ansar the shore of time I stand: One foot upon its sand,
One foot upon its sea;
Longing to reach the fairer land,
To hear the voice of God command, "- Rest, thou, with Me." The shore of time! The sea of life! My days of weary strife Thereon are almost past:
The surging waves, the billows rife
Will cease, and I shall rest from strife

Selegt Tale. THE WILDCAT CIRCUIT.

Rank weeds grew about the only remaining church on Wildcat circuit, and over the door there grew a green sawbriar. Wild bogs slept in the old log house, and the screech-owl, with his tremulo roosted under the eaves. Conference after conference had attempted to reclaim the old church, for the vines of many fond memories were clinging about it, but each attempt was a failure. There bad been a time when the glad shouts of the regenerated and the thankful prayer of the sanctified called forth a hymn of joy from the devout congregation, but that time was long ago, for boys who had then, dinging to the skirts of their excited mothers, wondered what the commotion meant, had become fathers. The religious system, and consequently the social complexion of the neighborhood had been changed by the war. The saintly brothers, harassed by guerillas and robbed by marauders that belonged to both armies, moved away, many of them, and those who remained forgot their church relations and finally became rough sneerers at the creed of which they had once been strong but gentle supporters; so, many years later, the uncouth men of the Wildcat circuit laugh-
