Poetry.

What the Corn Juice Flows.
My son, afore you leave your home I want to say to you, That's lots of pitfalls in the world to let young roosters through.
So keep a padlock on your mouth and skin your weather eye.
But never advertise yourself as being monstrous "big."

At this moment the corn came in, and Miss Wilton, he said in a clear, sweet tone that thrilled her with its earnestness. "Father has written me so often of you, and your faithful visits which brightened the days otherwise very lonely for him."

Babbette fidgeted with the fringes of her shawl and wondered if college folks noticed short dresses and scuffed shoes, and what they thought of "poor beggars who couldn't appear well."

But the rector's son didn't appear to notice any deficiencies in dress or manner, and talked of her favorite books and authors in an easy, chatty way that made her feel at ease in spite of her misgivings.

"Would you allow me to walk home with you?" asked Max, as Babbette rose to go. "It is quite dark."

"I have run across here after nightfall alone quite often," answered she, but I might fancy myself cowardly for once, and I smiling, she accepted the escort.

"It seems to me that we were never strangers, Miss Wilton," said Max, as they walked slowly along under the gloomy clouds. "Father has written me so much about you that I was really surprised when I met you here."

"I shall be glad," whispered Babbette, clinging to his arm in the darkness.
"Then God has really sent me to you, he answered, reverently holding her hand a moment in parting."

"Have you heard the news?" asked Uncle Wilton at dinner one day some weeks later.

"No, papa," chorused the daughters:
"pray tell us."

"Well," said he. "The rector's son has fallen heir to a mint of money; by the death of a relative he becomes sole heir to his property, worth about a million or so."

"Oh, my! and he is handsome and a collegiate too," whispered Kate, who was fast approaching the old maid line.

"We must invite him to our party down the river," put in Clara. "I'll swear he'll be the life of the party, and besides, he'll be a millionnaire at the Wilton's wedding party would be quite the thing; we shall be the envy of our set."

But Babbette didn't join in the conversation; she grew very quiet. Could it be that Max was really a millionaire?

Would he exchange his proud, cold and formal dignity for an acquaintance —now that he was wealthy?

He had so often sought out the silver lining to her dark cloud of late, that it seemed impossible to endure a change in him; his friendship was very precious.

The family knew nothing of her secret and went on discussing the rector's son and his money, not aware that the girl had left her dinner untouched as she crept away to her room to think it over.

That evening Babbette walked slowly up and down under the darkening eddies, alone; she wanted to be alone and the gloomy shadows were fitting the occasion.

But she was not alone; no, some one was coming. "I am so glad to find you Babbette," said the voice that always thrilled her, "I have glad news my little friend."

"I have heard," answered the girl wearily. "You are a wealthy gentleman now, are you?"

"Won't you congratulate me?" he asked. "Aren't you glad for Max?"

"Why should I congratulate?" he said. "Why should I be glad?"

"Away from you? Why, Babbette, don't you know me better than that? I only bring you nearer to you if—if you will; it gives me liberty to tell you things very dear to my soul. Can't you guess, Babbette—love?"

"Then he did love her? She opened her lips; but the answer would not come."

"I have thought sometimes that you loved me, dearest; was I mistaken?"

"No," she whispered; "how could I help it?"

"I don't know; I am sure I don't want you to help it," he said with a low, pungent laugh. "Will you marry me, little one?"

"Yes, Max," and the lonely, friendless orphan crept into the arms of the millionaire; he whom she thought shut away by a wall of gold.

And in a dashed sort of way Egbert Wilton gave them his blessing, while the other members of the party looked on and enjoyed it as a piece of real romance, all excepting Kate and her sister.

Piqued and taken aback, the proud Misses Wilton stood aloof and looked down on little Babbette with disdain and whithering scorn.

Edgar L. Wakeman, writing of the Gypsies —the true Romany race—says that they universally regard the marriage relation.
The tent-home government and surveillance are such that gipsy children grow unconsciously and irretrievably into hereditarily virtuous lives and loves. Gypsies and youth regard virtue as noble perfection in a man as in sweet-beans or waffles, and a thing as dignity of husband to wife, or to husband, after marriage, has yet to be recovered of a gipsy on the European or American Continent.

A trotting dog is an attraction at the agricultural fairs at the west. He is a Canadian bred Irish setter, and is pulling a weight of about 150 lbs. His best time was at K-nese City, half a mile in 1:49.
He has beaten several ponies and horses, and is capable of great bursts of speed. A small dog of his breed, weighing but fifty-three pounds, very kind and intelligent, "Doc," the Toronto trotting dog, is a great favorite with the children, and is heavily backed in rewards for his services on the turf.

A terrible example of the power of the habit of using intoxicants comes from Columbia, Ohio, where Samuel White was pardon-ed from prison in 1871, on condition that he should refrain from the use of strong drink during the remainder of his life. He obeyed it for eighteen years, but at his daughter's wedding recently, he indulged in a protracted spree and was remanded to prison for life.
What terms are there strong enough to demonstrate a custom which places temptation in the pathway of such a man? While it was no disgrace to the daughter, her father was a coward, the fact that he owed his rehabilitation to his own weakness, his re-incarceration to his wedding festivities must cause her continual shame.

And the saloon says: "Just let me have a chance at this mother's boy. I will pay you anywhere from $100 to $500 for permission to lay a trap that will catch him. I'll change his 'two brown eyes' into two black eyes—put them in mourning' the boys call it; I'll change his 'snowy chin, where a single dingle' into a red, pimply chin, oozing with beer; I'll break his 'dainty nose' and hollow out his 'peach-bloom cheeks'; his 'mouth that soft words speaks' shall utter blasphemous oaths and foul language; his 'two restless feet' shall run swiftly in the way of destruction; and at last his 'laugh of joy' shall be turned into a cry of despair. In short change your 'mother's boy' completely, and give you for a total devil's boy."

Saved by Kindness.
We will call him Jim, for I do not remember his name. He has lost all respectability, and was a common gutter drunkard. His family had disowned him, and he was outcast from his friends. He was a total drunkard when they met him. Occasionally he kept a job at the stables where Dr. Davis kept his horse. One morning the Dr. laid his hand on Jim's shoulder and said:—

"Jim, I wish you would give up the drink."

"There was something very like a quiver of the man's lip as he answered: 'If I thought you cared I would; but there is a great gulf between you and me.'"

"Have I made any gulf, Jim? Think a moment before you answer."

"No, you haven't."

"If you had been a millionaire, could I have treated you more like a gentleman?"

"No, you couldn't."
