TO MY FRIEND J. C. ON THE DEATH OF AN INFANT. (For the Carleton Sentinel.) Could words of friendship, fond, and true, Your anguished heart relieve, My best I'd do, my friend, for you, Now that you sadly grieve. To comfort you I fain would try,
Now in your depth of grief,
But none may dry your weeping eye,—
No words could give relief.

Yet gladly would I help you bear Your trouble and distress, And, if it were a thing to share, Would gladly make it less. send these lines at least to show My heart-felt sympathy.

Dear friend, although so great the blow,

'Tis best that it should be. Those whom the gods love, early die," And leave this world of woe; So therefore try your tears to dry.

And think it better so. How gladly with aught else we'd part Than those we love to loose.

But, though your heart must surely smart. Which would you rather choose? To find on high, above the sky, A home and heaven fair; Or live sad sorrow's cup to taste. To sin. and sorrow know. our years to waste, and swiftly haste To reap what here you sow?

h! well you know 'tis for the best In innocence to die. And find sweet rest among the blest In heav'n, with God, on high. We do not loose our loved ones-no! Though sadly we deplore, To heaven they go, where not a foe And in that blissful land on high They're free from every care; The weeping eye we then may dry, For soon we'll meet them there. They're waiting us with anxious heart, On yonder shining shore. Death flings bis dart and we depart, Death claims us all, both low and high, All fall his hand before; Dear friend, then why, since all must die, Lament what dies no more? Can it be worse the rose bud-say-

To pluck and save with care, Than let it stay its little day To grow, bloom, perish, there The bud is plucked, and we complain
Its early doom to see, And think with pain, did it remain How fair its bloom would be! We're pleased to see the rose bud grow, And bloom so fair and sweet, But soon, we know, when rough winds blow That rose its doom will meet. The cankering worm, like human care, May come, and sore annoy, From earth and air, that blossom fair, Has foes that may destroy.

But e'en when all the ills have past That threatened to betide. Its leaves at last the ruthless blast Will scatter far and wide From murmuring then dear friend refrain, What Heaven wills is best, Your grief restrain, joys yet remain, So let the cherub rest. Sept. 9th, 1888.
