He broke out wearing the rude garb of a fishermaninto a song-a rude, nautical thing; but the old time air was sweet, and the voice that sung it wonderous clear and resonant, ringing out like a trumpet peal above the dash of the waves, yet sweet and tender as the note of a wood thrush. Over and over again he thrilled the quaint ditty, until every echo caught up the strain, and the whole place and the great sea itself seemed thrilling with melody. flood of lamp light and a slender girl's same figure, quaint and prim in its gown of gray, stood just behind the singer.

The boy stood silent, his eyes fixed on thoughts busy with the past. One night, especially, stood out clear and vivid-a wild, stormy night, when the sky was like iuk, and the mad sea thundered until the old farmhouse shook to its very center. They were down on the strand, his father and a half dozen fishermenhimself, a sturdy lad, following like a the men. A stately vessel lay out on the bar, and the strong gale was driving Boat after boat started out as booming guns begged for assistance, but each one was swamped or driven back. It was mere desperation, an old sailor said; no boat could stand such a gale—they could do nothing. His father chuckled to himself, and bringing out a sturdy craft of his own, placed himself at never to return again, the men averred; but Harry did not believe it. He had but Harry did not believe it. He had never known his father to fail, and he sat down amid the crash and roar to watch and wait. And not vainly, for by and by the sturdy boat beat its way back, bringing only one trophy, a little sea waif that the old man picked up—a tiny girl child with flaxen hair and blue eyes.
