ruled a little world. They should acquire intelligence which was the chief factor of conquest. They should rule nature and direct her energies. Knowledge strengthens, but that alone is not a power. Bread is not etrength but it gives it, so knowledge is a means of power but not power itself. Some contended that if the farmers' boy is educated be will have a distaste for his work; but such would be a false education. Loading the mind with learning; filling it with pages of book lore-with repetitions of unrelated facts is not education. The lower animals will imitate; the parrot can be taught to repeat words, but these are not educated. Neither was the ability to use big words an evidence of proper training. True knowledge was generally humble, and always opposed to predjudice. An untrained The Garleton Sentinel. mind will judge hastily; one that is educated will seek to know all the facts before giving judgment. That was considering what Education was not.

A mere cramming of the mind with knowledge leads the man down: if he is truly educated he makes knowledge a mere stepping stone-a means to lift himself up. It is the training that helps a man to do things, to know what is the truth, to make the most of
