The Old Year. The old year is passing quick away, Time steals away another day, And ere again will rise the sun His earthly race will all be run. He came to us from another sphere Where never was known a sigh nor a tear, With the bloom of youth upon his brow Where the livid hue of death is now. We hailed him then with hope and glee While bells were ringing merrily; We tasted then the best of cheer And gladly pledged to the new born year, When looking o'er the by-gone days, What shall we utter to his praise? What lasting pleasure has he brought, What noble battles has he fought? The old year brought us good and ill As future years forever will, And, though dark stains are on his brow, The world was ne'er so good as now. He brought us Spring with birds and flowers, The genial and refreshing showers,

In all her beauty, came again. Ah, yes! he brought us joy and grief, Although his time has been but brief, And come who hailed his advent then Have left for aye the haunts of men. Yes, friend and foe alike have fled And many homes, that hailed his birth With merriest cheer and social mirth,

And Summer, with her lovely train,

Now sunk in deepest gloom are they, The sunlight faded from their day. But though some bosoms he has wrung With anguish that's unto'd by tongue, Yet he has healed the aching smart, And hid the tear no more to start, And made the heart beat warm again That once had suffered keenest pain. Then let him go with his good and ill. And the glass again to the new year fill; Soon must sleep on a knowy of the cold remains of the once new year. -R, DSoon must sleep on a enowy bier

REGGIE'S CHRISTMAS GIFT 'And what does Reggie wish St. Nichlas to fetch him, a sled? 'A sword?' 'A drum?'

'What then, darling, tell mamma,' and the slender, sweet-faced young mother bent down and caressed the fluffy, blonde head lying on her knee. Razgie was silent a moment, then looking into his mother's tender eyes, he said, clapping most nervous and distrait manner imaghis fat, pink hands : 'Me wants a papa!'

Eleanor's pale face grew whiter yet. She had dreaded this hour : the hour when her child should ask for his father. And now that the question had come at this Christmas time, when everything was reminding her of her cruel loss, it seemed hard indeed. She did not at once answer her child, but caught him in her arms and held him pressed convulsively against her stormy breast. The tempest passed after a little, and she calmy said : 'Reggie, dearest, that is something St.

Nicholas cannot bring you. Choose, instead, some toy, darling. 'If I had a papa he could play wiv me,' eagerly suggested Reggie.

There suddenly flashed before her mind picture of what might have been. In stead of sitting here alone before the blazing fire, there might have been handsome, fair-haired man lounging there he Norwich & London Accident In- on the tiger skin, with Reggie climbing triumphantly over him, pounding him with his tiny fists, pulling bis mustache -kissing him. her face in the cushions. Reggie looked in the sorrowful eyes of his pretty mamma. He could not understand it. Mamma cried so much. The mammas of the little boys with whom he played did not cry. They scolded sometimes, which was something his mamma never did, but they never cried. There were papas in all the houses where Reggie was won't to visit. His childish mind was trying to grapple with this problem. There were papas, the mammas didn't cry! His mamma cried a great deal, and there was no papa. Now if a papa could be found perhaps mamma would not cry. An idea shortly grew in that busy, little brain. It was nearly Christmas and St. Nicholas surely must be somewhere about. Why should not Reggie go in search of him and finding him, beg for a papa?

St. Nicholas, he had been told, was a kind old gentleman to good little boys and Reggie had been very, very good for such a long time. Yes, that was it! he would set out directly in search of St. Nicholas and a papa. He stole quietly out of the room into the back hall. Here he pulled on his stout india-rubber boots, put on his overcoat and cap, drew on his fur mittens, opened the door, squared his shoulder and trudged out into the night. It was a frosty, star-lit evening. Reg-

What Shall we Teach the Children."

M. B, CLARKE.

Having been asked to write a paper upon Scientific Temperance Instruction, and being chairwoman of that department of our work, I ought to be that which I am not, a scientific person. So I shall simply call my paper, "What shall we call the children." In the first place a word as to the work already done. Last year we visited all the schools of the town and talked with the teachers on the importance of temperance teaching in the day schools. Many of them thought much good might be done in this way. We also offered prizes for temperance essays which were competed for in all the grades except the primary. In all the Unions of our Province this subject has been agitated, and Gladstone received 200 telegrams and 500 now in the present year 1889, we are happy letters congratulating him upon his 80th to state that the New Brunswick Board of Education has authorized temperance text books, and in our own town grades six, seven and eight have taken up the study in regular

There was horror, confusion and chaos

when Reggie's bedtime came and he was nowhere to be found. The absence of his wraps showed he was not hidden about the house for mischief. Grandfather aud grandmother were in a state of mind which it were idle to attempt to describe. The poor mother passed rapidly from one fit of uncon-
