Alcoholism in France. Even a paper like the Paris Figare, which has never been accused of taking too sombre a view of life, has roused to the increasing seriousness of the effects of alcoholism on natural life. In a long and able article on "Alcoholism and Madmen," it is shown that at the beginning of the present century the French were a very temperate people, drinking but little, and that little a pure wine of but trifling alcoholic strength. It was in 1800, that the practice began of dietilling brandy from wines, corn and potatoes, and since then spirit drinking and its deplorable effects have steadily increased, insanity being one of the most marked, as well as most deplorable of these effects. To such an extent has this been the case, that while the population of the department of Seine has increased two-fold, the number of the insane has increased ten-fold. In the years of 1870-87. inclusive, the lunatics of that department have increased from 6,000 in the earlier year to 10,000 in the later. In 1804 the amount quarter of a pint. Once, when she perpetrated some especially annoying trick on him, and he had met her out of school hours on her way home, her pretty smile and look of respect had driven every spark of anger from his heart and he broke out:

'Oh, Nan! Why will you'—

But an hour sped by and still Joel was alone. The water kept rising steadily till it drove him to the top of the desks. He noticed that the tide was coming up much faster than at any time before. There was no longer such a rush about the house.
