Poetry.
A Kiss He Took.
And his heart grew suddenly lighter,
And his eyes grew suddenly brighter, Yet the dull gray more seemed brighter, For hearts are such that a tender touch May banish a look of sadness.
A small, slight thing can make us sing,
And a frown will check our gladness.
The cheerless ray along our way Is the little star of kindness, And the least thing some careless thing That was done in a moment of blindness.
We can bravely face life in a home where strife No foothold can discover, And he loves still if we only will,
Though youth's bright days are over.
Ah, sharp as words cut the unkind words That are far beyond recollection, When a face like his "neath a coffin lid,
And bitter tears are falling.
We are left to live the life we live To undo our old misdeeds; Then let us not make the same mistake When we part in the light of morning.

Select Tale.
JOLI.
If it be a crime to believe in humanity and to trust a friend, that crime I am committed, and sorely I have been punished for it. I had known and loved Andrew Dufresne from a child, and when, in his trouble, he came to me, I gladly gave him my name as an endorsement of his good faith.
He had betrayed me and fled, and to save my name from dishonor I relinquished every acre of my ancestral estate and went forth into the world a ruined man.
Had it been a mere question of the loss of wealth, I should have felt the blow less, but it seemed to me from the woman I loved, in the bitterness of my grief, I believed for ever.
Her family would never consent to her union with a beggar. Nay, could I ask her to share my poverty and assist me in the struggle for mere subsistence?
So I wrote to her, despatching nothing, and released her from her engagement.
The next day I turned my back upon all that I held dear in this life.
So utter was my downfall that when I reached the Villoroy, the cathedral town, I had remaining, out of all my wealth, only the suit I wore and a few francs in silver.
I turned aside from the main road, and, entering the square before the cathedral sat down to meditate. The massive gray walls of the cathedral, with its spire tapering four hundred feet into the air, caught my eye. An evil inspiration rushed into my mind. A leap from one of these small windows, scarcely visible in the height of the spire, a swift plunge, one pang, and all will be over.
I walked hurriedly toward the portal of the church, finally resolved upon the deed. As I was about entering, my attention was attracted by a placard posted upon one of the pillars near the door.
I mechanically approached it and read as follows:
6000 FRANCES REWARD
"The above sum will be paid to any person who will venture to mount the spire and attach a cable to the vane. Further particulars and the mode of obtaining the reward may be learned at the office of the Mayor, who will also have a small price for the poorest horse in my stables a week before—seemed marvellously large now.
With six thousand francs could I not begin anew in life, win back my fortune by earnest endeavor, and with it I could at once pay myself the reward I was forgotten in the sudden revelation of hope.
I turned to ask an explanation of the placard from the old sacristan who stood near.
"It is a large sum," he said, gravely, "but it has tempted no one to make the trial."
"Why? I enquired. "Is the feat considered so dangerous?"
"Dangerous!" he echoed. "Say rather certain death. Last winter a great storm wrenched the great hall from its socket, leaving it in an unsafe condition. They want some brave adventurer who will ascend outside the spire and fasten a rope to it. No one has thought of the reward, no one dares try it now."
"I will try it," I said quietly.
"You?" cried the old man, starting back. "Why, you are a gentleman. You cannot—pardon me—need the money?"
"No," I replied, my cheek flushing, as I uttered the falsehood. "It is from the love of adventure—yes, the love of adventure."
The old man looked at me solemnly, as if he did not believe my words.
"You will surely be dashed to pieces," he protested. "Many strong men and skilled climbers have refused the task."
"It is not a question of strength or skill," I replied. "It merely requires courage and calmness and I possess both." The sacristan made no further attempt to dissuade me, but with a look and manner as if he were preceding me to my execution, led me up the winding stairs of the spire until we reached the last gallery, where my perilous ascent was to begin. Hence he gave me a few heights of three hundred odd feet. When I was swung out in the narrow window of the narrow window, I saw the old sacristan with a muttered prayer. The spire of the Cathedral of Villoroy is one of the tallest in Europe. From the pavement to the top of the great golden ball, rises nearly four hundred feet. The ancient architects built their steeples as if they never dreamed they might need repair in the future. In the present instance no means of ascent above the topmost gallery to the ball had been provided.
From the window to the base of the ball the distance was seventy feet, the slope very acute, and, except at the corners where the blocks of stone were joined at right angles, as smooth as glass. Up these joints ran a vertical coping of stone broken at intervals of ten feet by protruding ornaments, carved in the shape of the trefoil. My plan, the only possible one, was to cast a loop in my rope over the trefoil above me, and, clapping the coping between my knees, haul myself up the rope. When I had reached the trefoil I would bestride it, unfasten the rope, endeavor to cast the noose over the next above my head, and so on. All this I was to accomplish over a sheer height of three hundred odd feet. When it is remembered that the trefoils, my sole supports, extended but eighteen inches outward from the spire, and were moreover, worn smooth and slippery by the weather, some idea of the terrors of my task may be gained.
But I was desperate. To fail there way meant death to me. What difference if my fall was accidental, or the self-conscious act of despair? And was I not warmed by the sweetest of all hopes?

To reach the ball, fasten the rope and pull up to it, and descend again in safety, was in my mind equivalent to winning back my lost betrothed. With a firm heart and cool brain, I began my upward journey.
My first glance downward sickened me with an awful terror, and I clung frantically to the coping with a sense of falling headlong into the space. The feeling lasted but for a moment. I regained my coolness and looked about me.
Carefully preparing my rope, I cast it at the trefoil above me. It missed and came rattling down, nearly upsetting me.
I tried again and again, until, at the tenth effort, the noose caught and remained firm. Gripping the coping between my knees, and the rope in my hands, I worked my way slowly until panting and exhausted, I bestride the trefoil ten feet above the window.
There I clung, resting myself for a moment.
My next effort took still longer, and, at the end of an hour, I had as yet climbed twenty feet, with fifty still to climb.
As I clung to the second trefoil, a faint tumultuous noise reached my ears.
Looking down, I saw that a crowd had collected in the square, and was watching my movements with turbulent interest.
But I paid small heed to it, and resumed my upward journey.
My progress became more difficult with each step. The trefoils grew smaller and smoother as I mounted.
A strong wind had arisen, and, blowing aside my rope, compelled me to reduce to my efforts; but I persevered, and at four o'clock in the afternoon reached the stone ring supporting the ball.
As I stood ring, panting and dizzy with my labors, a tremendous shout from below hailed my triumph. This time, in the fullness of my joy, I waved my hand to them in response.
The ring where I sat was about two feet wide, and afforded a comfortable, but precarious resting-place.
Along its outer edge ran a second ring of iron, as thick as a man's wrist, and within each of the rings, in an instant pulley and rope plunged out of sight.
Mechanically looking over, I saw them hanging over a projecting corbel two hundred feet below. I was as utterly separated from the world, from all possibility of human aid, as if I had been stranded upon a desert island in the mid-Pacific.
The seventy feet I had passed by the aid of a rope I could not repeat without it. The slops were at such an angle that if I had attempted to slide down it, I should have shot into space like an elastic ball. I tore a leaf from my notebook, and wrote upon it these words:
"My ropes have fallen. I am imprisoned upon the tower. Unless some brave heart will mount to my aid, I am lost." I attached the paper to my punkie and threw it into the crowd. I heard a sudden wild shout. "Then there were runners hither, and thither, aimless gesticulations; many were upon their knees in prayer, but none came to the rescue.
The sun set and night, with its countless stars, brooded solemnly over my awful plight. Fires were lighted in the square below, and the throng still kept their station, though I was visible to none longer.
The sun arose in glory, lighting the golden ball above my head, and revealing the sun once more to the vast throng below.
A great, solemn murmur reached me.
It was their farewell to me; they knew that I was doomed.
After that, as I lay in the shadow of the ball, I fell into a deep slumber, and had dreamed several hours. I was awakened by a shrill outcry from the crowd. Something new seemed to have occurred. Could it be possible that some one was coming to my aid after all?
I leaned down and looked over the stonework below me, but saw only a small black object mounting slowly up to the spire. What it could be I could not at first discern, but as it came nearer, I saw that it was a little animal. Then, out of the window from which I had begun my ascent, I saw a beautiful fair head emerge, and a hand waved to me, and I understood all.
Among Claire's favorites was a small monkey, Joli by name, a wonderful intelligent creature, who seemed to love his mistress with an almost human devotion. In my visits to the chateau I had succeeded in making friends with the animal, and nobly was he repaying my kindness. In obedience to his mistress's voice he was mounting up the stone work, drawing after him a slender cord attached to his waist. Often he appeared, dreading to return, but a gesture from his mistress impelled him onward.
When he came within the sound of my voice, I called to him in all the endearing terms of a lover, and never were the features of a friend more beautiful to me than the old little face raised to mine.
At length I lifted him upon the ring, unfastened the cord, and drew toward me, oh, how cautiously! a large one, and finally a rope, stout enough to bear my weight. It required but a moment to secure it, and, bearing Joli on my shoulder, to begin my descent. When I reached the little window, and was drawn in by a dozen strong arms, my overstrained senses gave way and I fainted.
I passed through a severe fit of sickness, nursed by the devoted woman who, in her distant home had devised the sole means of saving my life, and who now, in the divine perfection of love, yielded her all, her life and her fortune, to me.
