The verdict recorded in the Maybrick insurance case is one of more than ordinary interest, not that the issue tried is likely to affect many, but rather because the decision is in accord with the principles of British justice. Mrs.

Maybrick was convicted of having poisoned her husband. She sought, nevertheless, to recover personally the insurance on his life. The insurance company disputed the claim and the court has ordered that the money shall be paid to the executors of the murdered man on behalf of his children. This is but simple justice.
