Poetry.

To Victor.

Using the hymns of the conquered, who fell in the battle of Life, The hymns of the wounded, the beaten, who died Not the jubilation of the victors, for whom The receding solemn Of actions was lifted in chorus, whose brows Were the chapter of fate.
But the hymns of the low and the humble, the weary, the broken in heart, Who strove and who failed, who fought bravely And who died in silence; Whose youth bore no flower on its branches, Whose hopes burned in ashes away, From whose hands slipped the prize they had grasped at, who stood at the dying of day.

With the wreck of their life all around them, unhappy, unloved, alone, With death awaiting them, if they failed, and all but their faith overthrown, While the voice of the world about them —the praise for those who have won, While the trumpet is sounding triumphantly, and high to the breeze and the sun.

Glad banners are waving, hands clapping, and hurrying feet, Thronging after laurel crowned victors, I stand on a field of defeat.
In the shadow, with those who are fallen, and who have failed, and who are waiting, Chant a requiem low, place my hand on their pale, knotted brows, breathe a prayer, Hold the hand that is helpless, and whisper:
"They only the victory win Who have fought the good fight, and have vanquished the demon that tempts us within, Who have held to their faith unshaken by the prize that the world holds on high; Who have dared for a high cause to suffer, to strive, to fight, if need be, to die."

Speak history! who are life's victors? Unroll thy long annals, and say, Are they those who the world called the victors—who were the success of the day?
The martyrs, or Nero? The Spartans, who fell at Thermopylae's crest, Or the Persian and Xerxes? His judges or Scorers? Plutarch or Christ.

Select Tale.

A MODERN CINDERELLA.

"Oh, please!" said Miss Beatrix Belton.
"It's too provoking!" said Miss Clara, who was sitting next to her.
"What could have sent the little thing up from the country at this time of all others?" said Beatrix, twirling the rings around and around upon her fingers.
"I think the whole race of country cousins ought to be annihilated!" said Clara.
"They're very nice in July and August," said Miss Beatrix. "But, oh dear, who wants 'em coming down to New York in this unexpected sort of way, with hair dresses, and paper-covered hand-boxes, just when we're getting ready for the masquerade ball?"
"Hush—hush!" said Clara, lifting a warning finger, "here she comes now." And little Faith Blossom came in, with a slight expression on her dimpled child-like face, and her eyelids slightly swollen, as if with secret tears. For she had come to New York, fully believing that her city cousins meant all they had spoken in those gushing invitations of theirs, when they spent a month at the Blossom farmhouse, and somehow, her reception at the brown-stone house on Park avenue had not been all that she had anticipated.
"We were just talking about the ball," said Beatrix, trying to assume an easy nonchalance of manner.
"A ball?" cried Faith, brightening up at once. "Oh, I'm so glad! I brought a blue-silk dress that was mamma's once with lace trimmings, and—"
"But it's a masquerade," interrupted Clara.
"I suppose I could buy a blue mask," suggested Faith, who had dreamed of a masquerade ball all her innocent life long.
"Nonsense," said Mrs. Belton. "You've no idea, child, how the ladies dress here.
It isn't likely you've a hidden fancy for being of any use. I'm sorry, of course, as she saw the color rise to Faith's cheeks and the tears of mortified pride suffused her eyes; but I really think you'd better stay home. I dare say there will be some smaller party where you can wear the blue-silk dress, and Mrs. Maverick's masquerade is one of those exclusive affairs where there's a limited number of tickets, and I couldn't think of taking such a liberty as to ask for an additional one on your account."

"Poor child!" said Clara. "I'm sorry for her. Did you see how disappointed she looked?"
"It's just as well," said Mrs. Belton, recollecting. "She's so much younger than you, girls, and she has such a radiant country complexion—"
"Like a cabbage-rose, exactly," said the disdainful Beatrix.
"Gentlemen are apt to admire that sort of thing," said Mrs. Belton eagerly.
"And you see, she hasn't come to peeriproud and false hair yet, and you and Clara are getting on a little, and perhaps it's just as well that you shouldn't go out together."
"Yes," Clara added. "And Mr. South-wick was inquiring very earnestly about her the other day."
"That settles the matter!" said the judicious Beatrix. "She shall not go to the masquerade ball on any terms, nor to the party concert to-morrow, nor to Mrs. Kensington's kettle-drum on Friday."
"But, mamma, how are you going to prevent?"
"We can easily contrive one excuse or another," said Mrs. Belton. "She must be kept in the background until Emily Southwick has proposed for Clara."
"And when old Miss Morel called that afternoon and asked expressly for Faith Blossom, Mrs. Belton made some unpleasant excuse about her being indisposed."
"Call her down," said Miss Morel. "I'll take her out for a drive in my carriage.
Up to me in all she needs. I'll go bail I've taken such a fancy to that bright eyed little rosebud of yours."
"Miss Beatrix Belton, who would have given to be seen in the Park with old Miss Morel, was obliged to precede to go up to the little room where Faith Blossom was looking out over the dreary expanse of chimney pots, with her round chin in her hands and a homesick sensation at her heart.
"I don't think I care to go," said Faith sadly.
"Child, are you crazy?" demanded Miss Belton. "Mr. Southwick's aunt!
And the richest old lady in the city!"

Get your things on at once, or she'll say we are keeping you shut up, like a captive princess.
So little Faith Blossom went—and she and old Miss Morel became excellent friends.
"Not going to the masquerade ball?" said Miss Morel. "But you shall go!
You shall go, in spite of 'em all!"
"But I've nothing to wear," said Faith.
"I'll see to that," said Miss Morel, with eyes that twinkled roguishly behind her black Chantilly veil, that was worth its weight in bank-notes.
"And Aunt Margaret says—"
"Never mind Aunt Margaret," interrupted the old lady. "We'll make a modern Cinderella of you, my dear!
Just you keep your own counsel, and we shall see what we shall do." Clara and Beatrix, who had appeared themselves gorgeously, upon the night of the masquerade ball.
"It's so lucky that Faith has gone to her room early with a headache," said Clara. "It often seem hard to keep her at home when—"
"Nonsense!" said Beatrix. "What could we do, weighed with a little country fright like that?"
"I saw her blue-silk dress yesterday," said Miss Clara. "Such a dowdy old thing!"
It is quite out of the question that she should go," said Mrs. Belton, who was squeezing her plump figure into a crimson satin dress profusely trimmed with throat lace and hedges.
"But the back which had been engaged to convey the three ladies to the ball had hardly driven away from the door when the lamps of Miss Morel's coach carriage came blazing around the corner like a pair of fiery eyes, and Keturah, the maid, all smiling, opened the door before the footman had time to ring.
"She's all ready, mem," said breathless Keturah. "I helped to dress her, mem, I did!"
There was a brilliant assemblage gathered that night in Mrs. Maverick's superb suite of apartments, but the belle of the occasion was the beautiful young girl who came as Summer Dawn, with old Miss Morel—Summer Dawn, with dew drops of pink and peacock, with dew drops of tiny solitary diamonds, and lovely golden hair floating like a cloud over her shoulders. "Such eyes!" said Mrs. Maverick.
"Such a complexion!" said Mrs. St.
Elwase.
"Such a figure!" cried Miss Dubouque who was an amateur sculptress, and as such qualified to express an opinion on the subject.
"Who can she be?" said Beatrix Belton, who, in the crowd, could not catch the apartment where her home was being paid to the bells of the evening.
"The most peerless little creature that has been introduced this season," answered Mr. Wynfield, with admiration.
"But, upon my word, I couldn't catch her name, and she hadn't had a chance of being introduced."
"I wonder if I could get an introduction," said Clara, wistfully.
"I'm afraid the crowd around her is too great," said Mr. Wynfield.
And when at last, by dint of infinite pushing and pulling, a torn dress and a damaged point-lace fan, Miss Belton succeeded in reaching the blue and silver boudoir where Mrs. Maverick received her most select and favored guests, she was just a little too late.
Miss Morel and the radiant Summer Dawn were gone.
Clara could have shed tears of vexation. She had missed an introduction to the reigning sensation (Mrs. Bel-ton's eldest daughter), she had understood a bold tuft-hunter; she had risked her dress, she hadn't had a chance to speak to Mr. Southwick, who was there as Sir Walter Raleigh, in costume of black velvet, clasped with topaz and slashed with orange satin, and she hadn't stood up to dance in one solitary set.
"Hate masquerade balls," said she separately. "They're the stupidest things in the world."
Mr. Emil Southwick called the next evening, however, and Miss Belton brightened up a little.
"Give me the card, Katy," said she to the maid, and I'll take down my crumples in a minute."
Keturah grinned like an African girl.
"It ain't for you, Miss Clara," said she.
"It's for Miss Blossom!" Ten weeks afterwards Faith Blossom went home an engaged young lady, to prepare for her wedding.
"But remember, my dear, the bridal outfit itself—the dress and veil and orange-blossoms and all—are to be my present," bemoaned Miss Morel. "We didn't think, did we, Cinderella, that the prince would come so soon?" For little Faith Blossom had won the heart of Emil Southwick.
"But where did he first see you, child?" eagerly demanded Beatrix Belton, who could scarcely believe the testimony of her own ears, until her eyes corroborated it by means of the superb diamond engagement ring.
"At Mrs. Maverick's masquerade ball," said Faith, smiling and coloring.
"At the masquerade ball? Where you were?"
"Miss Morel took me," said Faith. "I was dressed as Summer Dawn, in pink and white, and Miss Morel lent me her diamonds."
Beatrix stared. Clara dropped her workbox.
"Faith," cried they, in an unconscious breath, "were you the Summer Dawn—the belle—the beauty—the observed of all observers?"
Faith Blossom's cheeks grew rosier than ever.
"I believe there was only one Summer Dawn there," said she.
"Was my little Cinderella," said old Miss Morel, who had come noisily in, and stood behind them. "And God bless her, she has won the prince!"—Any Likeness comes from liking. We grow to be like that which we like, and which we reach after with longing.

If we like the pure, we grow in purity.
If we like the impure, we grow in impurity. Therefore it is that in the end we have what we want, and are as we would like to be. "Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness; they shall be filled!"
A good, honest laugh at a good, honest joke or bit of sarcasm, rubs out the gathering wrinkles of care; but an ill-tempered joke is like a poisoned arrow, which makes a wound and leaves its poison after it has been withdrawn.

Get your things on at once, or she'll say
we are keeping you shut up, like a captive princess.
