In my last I gree you some account of the country between Ottawa and Lake Superior. The distance from Heron Bay, where we first get sight of the lake, to Nepigon where we leave the lake is by rail 126 miles, though, in a straight course, I do not think it is more than half that distance. I had imagined that the railway took a straight course, at a sufficient distance from the lake to avoid the ficient distance from the lake to avoid the bayous that put up from the lake, but I now see that that would have been impossible, for the country is covered with mountains, and the mountains are solid rock. Besides, it is found necessary in many places for the road to have communication with the lake. So that the route it takes seems to be the only feasible one and to any other company but the C. P. R. I think it would have appeared an impossibility. A great part of the way it is cut right out of the steep side of the most tremendous bluffs, so that looking down from the oar window to the bottom is enough to make one shudder, a roadway only just wide enough for the track, a long line of care and a very crooked road. Should the least mishap take place it would throw the train from the track, and we would be all hurled ot darkness for quite a length of time. Owing 182,000,000.
