An Ottawa despatch, Sept. 10, says:-The point has been raised that even if the government desired to dissolve parliament before another session, the last thing in their minds, they have not the power. Because, under the redistribution act of 1892, the next general election must be held as per the redistributed constituencies, and as another act provides that there shall be no revision of the lists this year it is argued that there would be no voters' lists for the numerous new constituencies, and that this bars the way for any election this year. It is a new question, however, and one that does not call for more than passing mention because the government would not venture to dissolve parliament before another session.
