A party of Paraellites at Kilrush, Ire land, while celebrating the new year, Saturday night, filled themselves with whiskey and determined to wreak vengeance on the anti-Parnellites. They marched in a body to the rooms occupied by the workmen's club and made an attack with stones on the building. They smashed all the windows and did other damage. The mob gained fresh accessions and attacked the temperance hall. In a short time the latter building was Our entertainment which consisted of a Sun-

Mary's Lamb. Mary had a little lamb. Its firece was white as chalk; And everywhere that Mary went That lamb would thither walk.

It went with her to skate one day: Of course it was a duage To think that it could run and play Upon the ice at once. It skinned its nose and hurt its leg.

And made poor Mary cry; And dude declared the woolly plague Most surely ought to die. A dog was better for a pet, If taught to stay at home; And he would send at once and get One all the way from Rome.

Is time the dog from Rome appeared, His color was light brown. His size so great that Mary feared He'd terrify the town. Now Brun loved his mistress dear. But con da't go the dude; And he was alwas mighty near

And if they walked or if they sat, 'Twas all the same to him; He kept his vigil like a cat, Nor grew his shadow dim. Nor grew his shadow dim, my boys, What though the shadows grew— "No love for them without a noise,"

When Mary's lover wooed.

Was Bruno's motto true. No gentle arm was round her waiet. No kies upon ber brow; The dude so longed her lips to taste. But dare not do it now.

For Bruno well could comprehend The tricks of lover's lore: What happened once he did intend Should never happen more. The dude, alse! in sorrow sighed,
And thought of Mary's lamb,
Declared he had in foolish pride

Just acted like a clam.

Now all ye men who maiden's woo, From this a warning take; Let lambs alone if they let you Alone, for love's own sake. And would you more the dog appeare,
